Kitty Ussher: The hon. Gentleman raised the issue and I have responded to it. The crucial issue is the quality of people's debt, and we are nowhere near the situation in the United States.

Several Members mentioned Farepak, and particularly the consumer awareness campaign that the Office of Fair Trading has been given funds to undertake. It was launched this summer and very much aimed at affecting decisions in the run-up to this Christmas. It aims to give consumers an informed choice about where they save their money for Christmas. We have launched the campaign through the media in Scotland, Northern Ireland, and north-east and north-west England, with Wales and the midlands to come. There will be a national advertising campaign highlighting the issue through the media in the coming months. The sessions are under way and I am told that the results are encouraging, so in response to the question about whether the campaign has started, it absolutely has.

On the wider response to the Farepak issue, we are pleased that the new trade body, the Christmas Pre-payments Association, is monitoring the initiative of companies in improving security for consumers' money, which is held in trust accounts under the control of individual trustees. The Companies Act 1985 investigation is expected to be completed by the end of this year. Depending on the findings, it could lead to prosecution or disqualification, or indeed both. However, we do not know, because the work has not concluded, and often it is not published. However, appropriate action is always taken as a result of such work. Once we have the outcome of the Companies Act investigation, we will consider whether further regulation is needed.

On financial capability and education, I too have seen the benefit of an IFS course on financial literacy in my constituency. I have listened to 15 and 16-year-olds at Burnley college explaining with great maturity how they would decide what type of credit card to have, if any, and how they would make various judgments about what savings and pension schemes they would put their investments into. I found listening to them an empowering and liberating experience, and I commend the IFS for its work and the Personal Finance Education Group, which has a huge impact up and down the country.

My colleague the Secretary of State for Children, Schools and Families recently made an announcement about entrenching financial education in the curriculum. Some £11.5 million has been earmarked for that. It is exciting that the first cohort of children with child trust funds are now entering the school system, because that provides a peg on which to hang the discussion of financial issues. They may not be able to go into what an APR is at the age of seven but, as they migrate through the school system, having their own child trust fund will help them to understand the real choices that they will face, regardless of gender, background or anything else.

Julia Goldsworthy: The Minister's predecessor made a great deal of the fact that seven-year-olds would be standing in the playground talking about the relative benefits that their parents' investments in their child trust funds had brought. Perhaps her predecessor might have done that, but does she really think that seven-year-olds will be doing it?

Kitty Ussher: No, of course I do not, but I visited a primary school in a deprived part of north London with my predecessor and we saw the innovative curriculum that teachers had developed to start to teach basic awareness of financial literacy. Yes, at that age it is just about counting up money, how much an omelette costs and so on, but I could see that children of all ability streams were able to engage with it. When translated across the board and at all levels, such imagination will make a real difference.

We need to do more to encourage additional top-up contributions to child trust funds, but we are definitely making progress. Members of Parliament can make a difference through how they talk about the matter in their constituencies, and every single child will have a trust fund opened for them. It is certainly not the case that some will and some will not. The challenge is to ensure that, as early as possible, family members and friends engage with the process so that the asset can be as high as possible. Small contributions made at an early stage can have a huge effect when a child reaches 16 or 18.

The Committee is well aware that we commissioned Otto Thoresen to provide advice to the Government on the prospect and implementation of a generic financial advice service. I do not have answers to the specific questions that have been asked, because we are still waiting for the final version of that report, which will be received in the spring. We hope to incorporate our response to it in the financial capability action plan, which a separate cross-governmental ministerial group is currently putting together. I was asked about funding. We have always said that any generic financial advice service should be jointly funded by Government and industry. We do not yet know how or by how much, because we have not yet had the final report. We hope to have the answers for the Budget timetable because, again, there are spending implications.

On post offices, I am conscious that I may need to bid to be a Minister in another Department to answer in great detail. I congratulate the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) on becoming secretary of the all-party group on post offices. He made some important points on the rural economy and I share his view. All that can be said at the moment is that the current Post Office card account contract does not end until March 2010, and we have decided that there will be a new service after that. It will be available nationally and customers will receive a set of services similar to those currently provided. We must tender competitively for it, and Members will have seen the Official Journal of the European Union notice that was placed a while back, a copy of which is in the Library.

It is important to say that existing customers do not need to take any action at the moment. They can continue to be paid, and new Post Office card accounts can still be opened. The contract has not yet been awarded, and I take on board all the points that have been made about the functionality that it should have. That matter is currently part of the negotiations with the various potential consortiums that have tendered, so I am not in a position at this stage to say what the precise arrangements will be. We hope to announce the conclusion of the procurement process in the summer of 2008, so I need to appeal again for a little patience.

Mr. Love: I assume that Ministers are well aware of both the sensitivity of the client group of the Post Office card account and their worries about what is coming. May I make a plea to her and her colleagues in other Departments that, at the earliest possible opportunity, time be taken to explain what is coming and consult on it? Otherwise, we will further exclude a group that is already partially excluded.

Kitty Ussher: I am grateful for that contribution, and I certainly agree with my hon. Friend. We are currently in contractual negotiations, which will come to a conclusion shortly. That will leave a huge amount of time to explain things and make transitional arrangements in so far as they are required. I do not even know at this stage what major differences there will be, but I thank my hon. Friend for his advice and contribution.

The Government are absolutely committed to ensuring that financial inclusion concerns are at the heart of our policy and our policy making process. We want to make it easier for people to manage their money more effectively, plan for the future and deal with financial difficulties as they arise, and we completely accept that the best way to deal with financial difficulties is to have some savings tucked away. It is an exciting time for those of us involved in this area of policy. A number of decisions will be made imminently, in the next few weeks and months, so the debate is timely. I am grateful to the Committee for the work that it has put into the matter, and I look forward to its continuing advice and scrutiny in the weeks and months ahead.

Question put and agreed to.

Children (Immigration Detention)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Liz Blackman.]

9.30 am

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington) (Lab): Today is universal children's day. It is also the anniversary of the 1959 declaration of the rights of the child and of the 1989 convention on the rights of the child. It therefore seems a suitable day to try to bring the attention of Ministers to bear on one of the most tragic and socially excluded groups of children in Britain in 2007—children in immigration detention.

Such children are uniquely vulnerable, partly because of the media climate around immigration and asylum, so it is possible to treat them in a way in which the state would not treat other children in this country. Children in immigration detention are vulnerable because, as we all know, when party leaders consult the polls, they find over and over again that one of the issues that people are most concerned about is immigration, asylum and borders. The Government have chosen to meet that fear and the concern reflected in opinion polls with an increasingly draconian system of immigration control.

This group of children is also uniquely vulnerable because who speaks for them? I know, because I have spoken to Ministers about this, that Ministers get constant pressure from Labour MPs in marginal seats who are worried about public opinion on immigration, and MPs who are calling for ever stricter and more draconian regimes. The pressure is all one way.

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe) (Lab): I apologise in advance that another commitment will take me away before the end of the debate, but as a Labour MP in a marginal seat, I just want to say that the pressure is not all one way. Quite a lot of my constituents are concerned in particular about children in this situation.

Ms Abbott: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I am not saying that all the pressure is one way, but the majority of pressures on Ministers are in one direction, whether they are pressures from the media, polling data or what MPs say on the Floor of the House and privately. That is why this group of children is uniquely exposed and uniquely vulnerable.

I remind colleagues that when the question of detaining children originally came up, in the 1998 White Paper entitled "Fairer, Faster and Firmer—A Modern Approach to Immigration and Asylum", the Government were saying that families should not normally be detained for more than a few days and only if they were due for removal. The starting position was that the detention of children and their families would be the exception rather than the rule and would last a few days at most. That was the basis on which MPs put the legislation through the House. The position now is that children are being detained in detention centres for up to three months and beyond. I shall come to the facts of the situation later in my remarks, but if people think about it, it is extraordinary that one of the wealthiest liberal democracies in the world should find itself locking up children arbitrarily for indefinite periods. We came to that position as a result of media and political pressure.

What are the parameters of the problem? It is not easy to establish the figures for the numbers of children held in immigration detention at any one time. The best figures available to me are provided in the Home Office publication "Asylum Statistics", which says that on 30 June 2007, 35 under-18s were being held in immigration removal centres. Of those, five had been in detention for seven days or less; 20 for between 15 and 29 days; and 10 for between one and two months. However, the previous edition of "Asylum Statistics" gave a figure of 50 children on 31 March. The most recent Home Office figures show that in the first quarter of 2007, 200 of the 3,580 people recorded as being removed from the UK on leaving detention were children.

Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes) (Con): Does the hon. Lady agree that one of the problems relates to the statistics and figures? They are totally unreliable; we cannot obtain accurate figures from anyone. A report by the John D. and Catherine T. MacArthur Foundation in November 2006 called "Seeking Asylum Alone" shows that, according to Home Office figures, 2,755 unaccompanied and separated children applied for asylum in the UK in 2004, but the number of Refugee Council referrals was 3,867. I know that these children are not necessarily detained, but where are they if they are not detained?

Ms Abbott: The hon. Gentleman has made a very important point, to which I will return. Whatever people's views on our system of immigration control, whether they think that it is too strict, not strict enough or just very badly managed, which is my view, we cannot have a robust system without the figures, and both on the general question of children and on the particular question of children in immigration detention, the figures are not robust enough. I have been very disappointed, in doing the research and looking at previous responses to questions, with Ministers' approach. Whatever the House believes the direction of travel should be on immigration control, at the very least we need robust figures. On the basis of the figures available to me, we are talking about some 200 children in the first quarter of 2007, but I will return to the question of the figures.

Let me begin to talk about the conditions in which the children are held. There are general issues that make those conditions deplorable. The first general issue that makes the detention of children for immigration purposes deplorable is the arbitrary nature of the detention process. I ask hon. Members to reflect on the fact that a child who has committed a criminal offence and is put in prison, who is serving a sentence at Her Majesty's pleasure—that is how sentencing is termed for children under a certain age—has more rights than a child held in immigration detention and is dealt with in a more transparent way. Immigration detention is not ordered or sanctioned by a court; it is an administrative power. People are not being detained because they have committed a criminal offence. That means that there is a lack of transparency and accountability and it gives the immigration service the kind of control over people's lives and rights that a court would not have. The first thing to say about the detention of children is the arbitrary nature of the process.

The second general issue, which is worth a debate on its own, is medical treatment. The medical treatment available to detainees in a detention centre has been a general concern. I want to refer to issues raised by doctors and groups such as Médecins sans Frontières. It is tragic that an organisation that is used to dealing with medical concerns in war zones and famine regions had to come to Britain to do an investigation into our detention centres. Among the issues raised by doctors in research that I have seen are depression and suicide. Many people in detention centres have post-traumatic stress disorder or are depressed. Some have been tortured and are not receiving therapy for that. Some are HIV-positive, but are not receiving the treatment that they should receive in the detention centre. Some come from areas of the world where malaria is prevalent, have lost their immunity to malaria after coming to the UK and have difficulty getting the proper course of treatment. Some suffer from tuberculosis. Those are general medical issues covering everyone being held in detention centres.

I suggest to Ministers that a detention centre is a peculiarly unsuitable atmosphere for detaining children. The arbitrary nature of the process—people do not know what will happen to them—and the problems with medical treatment are two general concerns.

Mr. Steen: Does the hon. Lady share my concern about such children, who come from outside the EU, which is that there is no system for appointing a guardian ad litem, a lawyer or anybody to have an interest in them while they are in Britain? They go into the system with no close friend and no support and just disappear. I am worried about children who disappear—not just those who disappear in care, but those who disappear in detention—and go back home on a plane without anybody knowing anything about them. Is she thinking of saying something about that?

Ms Abbott: I share the hon. Gentleman's concern. The way we are discharging our duty of care to such children simply is not satisfactory or appropriate for a country such as this in the 21st century.

Having spoken generally about the problems in detention centres, I move to some specifics relating to children. I could quote from many pressure groups and lobbyists, but I cannot do better than to quote the Government's own chief inspector of prisons, Anne Owers, on her most recent inspection of Yarl's Wood immigration centre in February 2006:

"Our most important concern…remained the detention of children."

She had raised that concern in her previous visit to Yarl's Wood. One of the disturbing things about the 2006 report is how little had been done since her previous visit.

"Yarl's Wood held 32 children at the time of the inspection, seven of whom had been there for more than 28 days. There was still no evidence that children's welfare was taken into account when making decisions about initial and continued detention. Though a social worker had recently been appointed, her role was unclear…We understand that she subsequently resigned."

I have known Anne Owers for years, ever since she was campaigning on immigration issues and I was a lobbyist on race and immigration issues. If the chief inspector of prisons puts such a paragraph into the introduction of her inspection report on a detention centre, it should not take a debate such as this to make Ministers realise that our treatment of children in detention is not satisfactory.

I should like to allow colleagues to hear the voices of children in detention, because in the debate on this issue—which is driven by concerns about polling, pressures from MPs and the latest front page of the Daily Express, among other things—not enough attention is paid to the voices of children. The Children's Commissioner for England visited Yarl's Wood in 2005. His report said many things about what he saw, including one thing that I thought disturbing:

"During our visit to Yarl's Wood, we spoke to a number of children", as that was the main purpose of the visit.

"Not one of these children had any clear idea or, in the case of some children, any idea at all, of why they were detained at Yarl's Wood."

It is one thing to say that a robust immigration control system requires the detention of children, but what immigration control system requires the detention of young children who do not know why they are there or what will happen to them?

A Save the Children report quoted the mother of a detained child:

"After the detention Michael was in a bad way. The bedwetting was a problem again and he had nightmares. He wouldn't go upstairs without me. At 9 pm when I took him to bed, I had to go to bed as well because he wouldn't let me leave…Michael was afraid of the police coming again. He was always afraid."

During a House of Lords debate on immigration in December last year, the Lord Bishop of Ripon and Leeds spoke about a case familiar to him from his diocese:

"We have experienced the case of Antonio, whose father committed suicide in Yarl's Wood in order that his teenage son should not be deported with him. Antonio went through the whole of that trauma and is now being cared for by a family in south Leeds. But he is not alone. The fear of the 5 am knock on the door pervades many Leeds families."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 14 December 2006; Vol. 687, c. 1674.]

A Children's Society representative says:

"We frequently witness first-hand the impact detention has on children. We are supporting a family in Yorkshire who were detained and then released. The mother has since been very ill, partly as a result of stress and not being able to get proper medical treatment while they were in detention."

The issue of medical treatment will come up again, and I shall return to it.

"The five-year-old, the youngest child, was so traumatised by the experience that he became mute. He has had some counselling, but I understand that there are still huge problems, and he doesn't come to our project anymore because the bars on the windows upset him, so we have to visit him at home."

A specific case was passed to me this morning that I should like Ministers to look into—the case of Meltem Avcil, whose 14th birthday is tomorrow. She will spend it behind bars in Yarl's Wood detention centre, where she has been detained with her mother for almost three months. In August this year, 12 immigration officials carried out a dawn raid on her home in Doncaster. The two were taken to Yarl's Wood in a caged van and have been held there ever since. Since being incarcerated at Yarl's Wood, Meltem has had no appropriate schooling. She and her mother have had poor medical and social support. Her psychological state has deteriorated and she has had to be taken to hospital after self-harming. We all know that we need a robust immigration system, but what immigration system creates as casualties traumatised children—children spending three months behind bars, celebrating their birthdays behind bars and not knowing what will become of them?

I return to the chief inspector of prisons, because what she said is important in this context, and Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons cannot be accused of being partisan or hearing only one side of the story. She raised a number of concerns in her report last year. She said that, despite the fact that there was a social worker in the centre, her role was unclear, that children were being detained for as long as 112 days, and that in most cases children were being detained for too long. She found that Yarl's Wood was still not performing sufficiently well in terms of purposeful activity. Immigration officials were still found to be leaving centre staff and detainees in the dark about their status and removal dates—again we return to the issue of children not knowing why they are there or what will happen to them.

The chief inspector of prisons' 2005 recommendation that the detention of children should be exceptional and for no more than a few days has not been achieved. In 2005 the inspector also recommended:

"Initial authorisation procedures should be strictly followed and an immediate independent welfare and needs assessment carried out, to set out a care plan and inform decisions on continued detention."

That had not been achieved at the time of the last report. The inspectorate could not even obtain data. Even for Her Majesty's inspectorate of prisons, the staff at Yarl's Wood could not produce data showing whether there had been any changes to the pattern for detaining children.

"No initial needs assessment was undertaken following the arrival of a child"; it took place only after 14 days' detention.

At the time of inspection, the reports that social workers were trying to produce were not being used by officers. Children who were interviewed reported feeling frightened at being taken into detention—one child was scared when the police broke down the door. The quality of education provision was still not up to scratch. Sufficient activities were not being provided for children. Staff were not receiving appropriate training. Detainees were still being told what beds they had to occupy, and families were being split up. Children were having to sleep with strangers. Those issues were all raised in 2005. When the inspectorate returned in 2006, it found that relatively little progress had been made.

I have spoken about the inspectorate because I believe that one cannot query the views expressed in its reports, but I want to mention also the views of other stakeholders and interested parties on what is happening to children in immigration detention. I begin by citing the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. I shall return later to the fact that the United Kingdom has entered a reservation to UN protocols in that regard.

Mr. Steen: Before the hon. Lady continues, will she confirm that Britain is the only country to have made a reservation?

Ms Abbott: We are the only country in the world. I shall return to the point because it is a grave and shameful matter.

The UNHCR regrets that the UK has made a reservation to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child in order to be able to pass immigration legislation without reference to its obligations under the CRC. It stated:

"UNCHR strongly disapproves of the UK's reservation in this area, which the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child has stated is not compatible with the objects and purpose of the CRC. However, it is important to note that the reservation is at least limited to the passing of legislation only, and so would not appear to operate as a relevant factor in questions relating to operational matters, such as decisions made regarding the implementation of immigration detention policy in specific cases. The Government, therefore, is free to follow humanitarian and moral imperatives to inform its policies on the detention of children."

The Minister will doubtless be relieved to know that the Government are free to allow humanitarian and moral imperatives to inform their policies on the detention of children.

I turn to what other stakeholders and people who have visited those children have said. The Children's Society states:

"We don't think it's ever acceptable to detain children for the purposes of immigration control. In practice it's very difficult for families to abscond because they need contact with services like health and education and it's much harder for a family to disappear."

The Refugee Children's Consortium has called on the Government to use the UK Borders Act 2007 to stop the detention of children. The four UK children's commissioners have expressed "profound" concern about the detention of children.

The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees states that it views the detention of minors as "a special cause for concern, and we are clear in our guidance that minors who are asylum seekers should not be detained at all...where exceptional circumstances necessitate the detention of asylum seeking children, states should also make provision for the independent monitoring of the mental health of detained asylum-seeking children, which should be facilitated by access to appropriate non-governmental organisations".

Save the Children, in its report "No Place Like Home", suggested that children in detention were vulnerable on account of being children, being detained and being immigrants. The all-party group on refugees published a report in July 2006, to which the Government have not responded, saying that the detention of children

"makes a mockery of children's rights legislation".

Finally, the Joint Committee on Human Rights, in its report on the treatment of asylum seekers in March 2007, found that the UK was in breach of its human rights obligations by detaining children. One of the report's authors, Lord Avebury, said that

"lack of accountability for all aspects of the detention of children pervades every level of policy and practice, and is exemplified by the Government's steadfast refusal to publish comprehensive statistics on the matter."

The lack of accountability pervades every level of policy and practice. Today's debate is my humble attempt to try to shed some light on the process and to bring some accountability to it.

Dr. Palmer: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way a second time. She will agree, I think, that there are two separate issues. One is whether the detention of children is ever justified. The other is how they are treated during the period of detention, if there is one. Having spoken to many constituents about the issue, I know that there is a certain acceptance that a short period of detention may sometimes be necessary rather than simply releasing the child, with all the risks that that might entail. However, there is overwhelming support for the greatest possible care for the children during the short period for which they might be detained. I am glad that my hon. Friend has raised the issue.

Ms Abbott: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention. When the matter originally came before Parliament, there was a consensus that detaining the family for one or two days might be necessary as part of the process of removal. However, no one taking part in that debate—some hon. Members who are here today were present then—ever envisaged children being detained for three months or beyond. No one ever envisaged that periods of detention would be so long.

I turn to what the Government are doing. I would not want it to be thought that the Government had paid no attention to lobbyists. First, the Minister for Borders and Immigration made a welcome statement about the need to incorporate a code of practice on the treatment of children as we rolled out the borders legislation. That statement was greeted with some gratitude by those who had lobbied on the issue.

Let me set out the Government's position on some of the issues that I raised this morning. First is the question of the reservation to the Convention on the Rights of the Child. A question was tabled about the subject in July and the immigration Minister responded. He said:

"The Government believe the reservation remains justified in order to maintain an effective immigration control."

The Government justify the reservation in the name of immigration control. We come back to the media and polling pressures—and the political pressure. In the end, a robust and sustainable system of immigration control, which is what Members from all parties want, has to be a system that the community as a whole, including even the asylum-seeking community, believe is firm but fair. A system of immigration control that is chaotic, badly run and contains a deeply flawed approach to vulnerable people such as children, will never achieve a consensus, and it will continue to be problematic. In his written answer, the Minister also said:

"we are proposing to introduce a code of practice to ensure that in carrying out its functions in the UK the Border and Immigration Agency takes appropriate steps to keep children safe from harm while they are in the UK."—[Official Report, 9 July 2007; Vol. 462, c. 1350W.]

That was a welcome statement. However, Ministers have also said things that were not quite so welcome. For instance, in a debate on asylum seekers in Westminster Hall in March 2007, my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) raised the question of the detention of children. The Minister said:

"We have also debated the question of detention. I am anxious to explore alternatives to detaining children. Sometimes, parents have a responsibility too; when I sign off cases of children who have been in detention for some time, I often find out that that has been because their parents have been disruptive or abusive or have exhibited dangerous behaviour towards staff".—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 28 March 2007; Vol. 458, c. 482WH.]

What is the Minister for Borders and Immigration saying but that children are being detained because of misbehaviour by their parents? I urge the Minister for the Home Department to read again the relevant UN convention. It is quite wrong and contrary to best national practice that children should be detained or punished as punishment for the behaviour of their parents, but that is what the immigration Minister said in March 2007.

In response to efforts in debates on the UK Borders Act 2007 in October to get further protection for children, Ministers spoke about the problem of judicial review, saying that trying to give asylum-seeking children the protection of children's legislation would "create a risk of judicial review and other legalistic devices being thrown against the agency, which will slow down its ability to remove people to the country".—[Official Report, 29 October 2007; Vol. 465, c. 553.]

The Minister for Borders and Immigration said:

"Judicial review presents a serious problem: between January and March this year we received an average of 79 judicial reviews a week challenging enforcement activity...I fear that the change to section 11 proposed by the hon. Member for Ashford would simply multiply those barriers."—[Official Report, 9 May 2007; Vol. 460, c. 233.]

I have been a Member of Parliament for 20 years, representing a part of the country with one of the largest numbers of immigration, refugee and asylum seeker cases. No one knows better than I do about vexatious judicial review applications or deplores them more than I do. They are a waste of time and hold up false hope to my constituents, who all too often have to find money out of their own pockets to pay for applications that are going nowhere. When I see that they are going nowhere, it is now my practice to ring the solicitor and ask, "Where exactly are you going with this?"

I do not believe in giving false hope to constituents, and deplore the fact that some of the poorest and most marginalised constituents have to find hundreds of pounds to pay for what are essentially legal delaying devices. If there is a problem with vexatious judicial review applications, however, the Government must deal with it, and not use it as an excuse not to meet the spirit and letter of their obligations to children. One understands the point made about jails, but it does not justify the wholesale abrogation of this country's obligations under the convention on the rights of the child.

Another part of the Government's response, on which many people have lobbied, is the pilot project on whether there are alternatives to detention. Apparently, those in the pilot are in supported family accommodation in a hotel and are being helped to work towards voluntary return. Families are expected to stay within the pilot scheme for eight weeks. It is too early to say how it is going. Worth while as the pilot is, however, it does not help children in detention at the moment, there is no indication of how it has reduced, or will reduce, the number of such children, there is no information on the criteria for entry into the pilot scheme, and there is no sign of how it will be independently evaluated. Although the pilot is welcome, one would like to see more transparency and a hope of independent evaluation.

Furthermore, as part of the Government's response, we have a report, entitled "Review of UKIS Family Removals Processes". It was commissioned by Dave Roberts and written by Judith Evans. I do not know if either of them is in the Chamber today. If they are, I hope that they will not take this personally, but I found it a bizarre and inappropriate document. It talks about putting the welfare of the child at the centre of the removal process, but that seems to amount to the idea that, as part of the removal process, immigration officers should keep a particular eye on the child. It does not talk about referrals. The report states that officials "should consider appointing named officers during any detention visit to review the reactions of the child to the process of detention."

Let us stop and think about that. Officials bang on someone's door at 8 am—they have said that they will not knock on people's doors before then—and a named official watches the child to see how they react to having their door knocked down and their mother dragged off to detention. What is the point of that, other than to make a token and derisory concession to the need to put the welfare of the child at the centre of our approach?

The report makes an even better recommendation. Obviously, the people who wrote it have read the same things as I have about how frightened and traumatised the children are by the process of being dragged away to detention, so they have thought very hard about what can be done about the psychological impact on children and proposed that the uniform of immigration officers be changed. They seem to be saying that what is frightening the children is the fact that the uniforms are navy blue or black and suggesting that they should be a pale colour—maybe pink or lilac! The idea that a child will be less traumatised by having their door kicked down and being dragged off to detention for an indefinite period by officers wearing a pink uniform rather than a black one has no place in an official Home Office report. Even when I was in the Home Office, which is now 25 years ago, we could have done better than that. It seems to me that the report was produced to address the widespread concern about the conditions in which such children are held, but it does not address the relevant points.

I know that hon. Friends involved closely with this issue wish to speak, so in conclusion, may I say that I am very concerned about the figures for children in detention? In particular, I was concerned by the response to a parliamentary question tabled in July by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore), who asked the Secretary of State:

"how many cases were referred to Ministers for review of the continued detention of children on immigration grounds beyond 28 days in each of the last three years"?

If a child is to be kept beyond 28 days, the case is meant to be referred to a Minister, although no Minister has yet turned down such a request. The Minister replied:

"The information requested on referrals is not centrally collated and could be provided only...at disproportionate cost."—[Official Report, 2 July 2007; Vol. 462, c. 916W.]

If we are serious about the welfare of children, at the very least we ought to keep centrally figures available on a monthly basis on the number of children we are holding beyond 28 days. Whatever a person's view on immigration control, it is not acceptable that we are keeping children beyond 28 days—in one case that I have raised with Ministers, for three months, in another, 112 days—and that those figures are not kept centrally. If one thing comes out of this debate, I hope that it will be a commitment from Ministers that from now on they will look at their record keeping on children and unaccompanied minors in detention. In particular, they ought to be able to provide Members, on request, with the number of children being held beyond 28 days.

We also need to do some really robust research into whether detaining families with children is necessary. The argument is that if we do not detain them, they will abscond. People assert that that is not the case. However, I am yet to see comprehensive research that proves it one way or the other. Above all, however, I put it to Ministers that reports that suggest changing the colour of uniforms are derisory. If Ministers are taking seriously the trauma that children go through, the Government need to commit themselves to bringing down the number of children in detention. How many times do international organisations, children's pressure groups, Her Majesty's inspectorate and the commissioner for children have to raise the point that the Government must bring down that number?

I accept what my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer) said; there might be occasional cases when a child has to be kept in detention for a few days. But the fact that increasing numbers of children are being detained for increasing periods, and that Ministers cannot say at any given time how many are being held for longer than 28 days, simply is not acceptable. I accept that the front page of the Daily Express will not be calling, five days a week, for action on children in detention. It is also perfectly true that nobody ever made their career in government by building a fair and humane system of immigration; one builds a career by the constant rolling-out of crackdowns, toughness, fresh initiatives and so on. However, I put it to Ministers that in 2007, it is time for one of the wealthiest liberal democracies in the world to comply with international standards on the detention of children. As other Members have said, it makes a mockery of our children's rights legislation that children in immigration detention continue to be held in such numbers for so long and in such conditions. I hope that Ministers will take on board some of what is said this morning, and that we can make some progress on the issue.

Mr. Steen rose—

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): I have two Members standing, and I intend to call both of you if I can. However, you are both facing Clocks, and I intend to start the winding-up speeches at 10.25 am.

10.10 am

Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes) (Con): I have only two points to make. Before I do so, however, I want to say that we owe a great debt of gratitude to the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott). Her speech was robust, compassionate and incisive, and the Minister will need a good quarter of an hour to deal with her points. I shall not cover the same area, but I thank her for raising the matter. It is constantly referred to in the Chamber, but not properly addressed.

My first point is on why the immigration service is so secretive. I suggest to the Minister that a group of Members—I should be one of them—might like to spend a day or two at the ports of entry, seeing what the immigration service does, particularly with regard to unaccompanied minors, asylum seekers and such like. I do not think that many hon. Members have seen what goes on there. I have joined the parliamentary police scheme, but I am halted every time I want to go to the immigration service, because it is outside the police's control.

I should have admitted to the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington that I was in her constituency last Thursday on a police raid in a sauna.

Jeremy Corbyn: Were you in the sauna?

Mr. Jeremy Browne (Taunton) (LD): Or were you part of the police team?

Mr. Steen: I was part of the police operation.

I have an idea of some of the problems that the hon. Lady mentioned, and some hon. Members who are present, and certainly some active members of the all-party trafficking of women and children group, which I chair, would be much more friendly and well disposed towards the Government if they could see what was going on.

Secondly, the all-party group had the director of social work for Manchester before it about a month ago, and she referred to a different sort of detention, which it will be useful to mention. Unaccompanied asylum-seeking children are usually put in the care of the local authority, which is supposed to involve detention and to be a safe place, because the constant refrain from all people in positions of authority is that we must put children in a safe place. I saw a child walking along Oxford street when I was on patrol with two policemen, and they took the child, who they thought was 13, into the care of the police station in St. Marylebone, because they believed that it was a place of safety. If local authority care is a place of safety, why do so many children disappear from local authority care? The director of social work in Manchester said that some children who come into care in Manchester disappear within minutes, and that others do so within hours.

I raise the matter only because the hon. Lady raised the issue of detention. If detention is too open, the children disappear, but if we have it as she would, there is criticism, too, because it would be incarceration. I do not quite know how she would redress that balance, but at the moment too many children disappear. In a recent report from the Home Office, the number of children who were thought to be trafficked was 380, and about 190 of those, who were in the care of local authorities, disappeared.

I also want to mention some other numbers. I have only the 2004 figures, because the figures are up the creek, as we know, but we are talking about 55 unaccompanied children from Afghanistan, 55 from Somalia, 50 from Vietnam, 55 from Iran, 35 from the Democratic Republic of Congo, 35 from Iraq, 35 from China, 25 from Eritrea, 20 from Uganda and 20 from Ethiopia. Those figures are for a three-month period only, so an enormous number of children come into this country unaccompanied. Some will end up in detention, some will end up in the care of the local authority, and an awful lot will go missing.

The Government do not have their hands on the problem, because when the children disappear they are never found. Many children from China "disappear"—they do not, of course, disappear, because an aunt, uncle or friend probably finds them. However, the number of unaccompanied children either in detention or in the care of the local authority is increasing. The numbers are about 3,000 to 4,000 a year, so it is a big problem.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): I very much appreciate my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) taking up the cause, the way in which she spoke and the great deal of research that she obviously undertook to present her case. It was a very fine contribution, which the House should note.

It is significant that the three Labour Members speaking today all have neighbouring constituencies: Hackney, North and Stoke Newington, Hackney, South and Shoreditch, and Islington, North.

Mr. Steen: Mine is not.

Jeremy Corbyn: I know about north Devon.

Mr. Steen: It is south Devon.

Jeremy Corbyn: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. We all know about south Devon, but my point is about Labour Members.

We are involved in the subject because we have multicultural and multi-ethnic constituencies, and immigration issues are real, serious and demanding of their Members. As the MP for Islington, North, I take up a large number of immigration and asylum cases all the time. Although there is nothing wrong with having a public debate about immigration, I appeal to the media to have a debate occasionally about human rights, justice and the nasty underside of immigration law and control. It is easy to get a headline saying, "There is too much immigration. We must control it. There are too many problems," but the other side of the issue is the incredible contribution that migrants have made to our economy and standard of life. We would not have much of a health service, or, indeed, many other vital services, if there had not been immigration over the past 40 years.

Another consideration is the treatment of individuals who have been denied the right to remain in this country and who have been threatened with, or are in the process of, removal, and the detention that is then carried out. My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington and I visited Yarl's Wood, and we spent a lot of time there. We saw all its sections, had meetings with the staff and discussions with people who are held there—frankly, one must refer to them as inmates, because that is in reality what they are—and we looked at the whole place. Whatever the decorations, equipment or concerns of staff, the issue is that we lock children up. For the child to leave their parents to make or take a phone call, to go to the medical room or wherever else, they must go through a series of prison-style locked doors.

Children are very impressionable. Young children remember small things for the rest of their lives. All of us have photographic memories of certain instances that happened when we were three, four, five, six or seven years old—it is an impressionable age. I do not think that any of us was in detention at that age, and none of us went through that sort of experience, but that is the memory that we are imposing on a number of children through our policy. We should think seriously about that.

Ms Abbott: My hon. Friend and I visited Yarl's Wood because of our ongoing concern about the problem. I must say that although many of the staff at Yarl's Wood were pleasant and clearly trying to do their best, I was unimpressed with the medical officer, whom I think I met when my hon. Friend was in another part of the facility. When I raised with the medical officer the concerns that had been raised with me about medical treatment there, he was quite dismissive and refused to accept that there was a problem with people not being provided with proper treatment for malaria. In his attitude, manner and unwillingness to engage, he stood out from some of the other staff. He seemed to reflect the concerns that are raised over and over again about the quality of the medical treatment at Yarl's Wood.

Jeremy Corbyn: I did hear some of that conversation, but not all of it. My hon. Friend raised those points. Children in detention should be under the protection of the Children Act 2004 and have access to full-quality national health service care and, if necessary, to social services protection, just like any other child in the country. I am not convinced that the reality of detaining children guarantees any of those things.

The campaigns on Yarl's Wood are considerable. Local people have often complained about it and there have been many demonstrations outside it. There is a history of problems in its administration. There is a wider point, however. On 28 March 2006, the Refugee Council pointed out that more than 2,000 children a year are locked up by the UK Government for immigration purposes. It had launched a new campaign and stated:

"The campaign is demanding an end to detention for children because:

It causes children distress, depression, creates behavioural changes and confusion. It can cause and exacerbate physical health problems; and lead to lack of sleep and weight loss. It disrupts a child's education, and can seriously undermine their ability to learn. It runs contrary to various international standards, including the Convention on the Rights of the Child."

I could not have put it better myself. This country is proud of being a signatory to the UN charter, the European convention on human rights, the 1951 Geneva convention, the convention on the rights of the child, torture conventions and all the others. They apply to us here, as well as to the demands that we make on people in other parts of the world.

Bail for Immigration Detainees, which has done good work, produced a handbook and press release on 2 July. The press release stated that children are being damaged by immigration detention because "No special consideration is given to the needs or best interests of children when deciding to detain a family. Detention is not clearly justified in each case, and existing alternatives to detention are not fully considered. Families, and children, do not fully understand why they are detained, have no automatic legal representation and their detention is not subject to a time-limit or independent review. Processes for welfare assessments of families and ministerial authorisation for detention beyond 28 days do not protect children from prolonged and harmful detention."

I hope that the Minister will give us some hope that all children who are being detained will be subject to ministerial decision so that we know exactly how many are being detained and why. I also hope that she will consider the Swedish system of having a caseworker assigned to a family, going through the whole process with them as a supportive mechanism. Very few, if any, children are detained there, and I do not see why we cannot do the same in this country.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington rightly referred to the statements made by Anne Owers, the former chief inspector of prisons. Like her, I know Anne Owers well and admire her work hugely. The fact that she made an unannounced visit to Yarl's Wood some time ago, in February 2006, made her statements and expressed concerns about children in detention, should be taken seriously.

My final point has an international context, relating to UN conventions. I attend UN Human Rights Council meetings as a non-governmental observer and have taken part in a lot of activities surrounding them. Many people there fulminate about abuses of human rights around the world, and rightly so—I join in all that—but that also applies to us. The United Nations Human Rights Committee expressed its concern that "asylum seekers have been detained in various facilities on grounds other than those legitimate under the ICCPR, including reasons of administrative convenience."

That statement was made some time ago, but the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees has expressed concerns about the UK Borders Act 2007. It has stated:

"UNHCR would like to encourage legislators to examine alternative arrangements for children to ensure that required contact management will be conducted in a child friendly manner and within the overall normative framework of the Convention on the Rights of the Child and the 1951 Refugee Convention."

We signed the convention on the rights of the child and pride ourselves on being a country that has democratic institutions and a robust defence of individual liberties and human rights. Detaining children defeats all those things. I appeal to the Minister to re-examine seriously the whole policy of detaining children and recognise the damage that it does to them. As a start, Ministers should know exactly how many children are detained at any one time and why, and they should have to give personal approval for that detention. That would show us to be taking seriously the rights and needs of children. I hope that we can move on to a system in which it is simply not necessary to detain children at all. We are damaging them, it is wrong and it is not morally correct.

10.27 am

Mr. Jeremy Browne (Taunton) (LD): Thank you, Mr. Olner, for calling me to give the first winding-up speech. I congratulate the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) not only on her speech but on using such parliamentary occasions in the most effective way possible—to highlight an ongoing area of Government policy that a Member regards as deficient, giving a Minister an opportunity to justify or, better still, alter and adjust it.

I agree with the hon. Lady's broad observations about the party political context that underpins much of the debate on immigration and asylum. It is shocking that the leaders of some political parties in this country seem to regard polling evidence in marginal seats as the main determining factor in deciding policies that have a direct impact on people's well-being. She mentioned the front page of the Daily Express, but it could have been any one of a number of papers—even the one that, until recently, was edited by the new chief spin doctor of the Conservative party. That paper takes an aggressive view of this area of policy and seems to put pressure on the Government and other political parties to respond in rather draconian terms, which often jars with the better and more liberal instincts of millions of people.

Ms Abbott: The problem with the current approach to immigration control is not just that it is draconian, which I personally deplore, but that it is wholly ineffective.

Mr. Browne: I am grateful for the hon. Lady's intervention, because I wholeheartedly accept her point. We hear a huge amount of extremely tough talk from the Government—they are "cracking down" on aspects of immigration policy the whole time—yet it does not seem to have worked. If it had, they would manifestly no longer need to crack down, because their policy would have achieved their desired objective.

Most people would accept that there may be a need for transitional arrangements while people's immigration and asylum applications are being processed. It may be that, for short periods of time, it is desirable not to separate children from their parents and that it is necessary to hold them in those circumstances. Most people, however, would wish their treatment to be entirely humane and that the atmosphere and surroundings in which they are kept are as close to a home and as far removed from a prison as possible.

I have three broad points to make. The first is about the Government not enforcing the UN convention on the rights of the child and about their desire to be seen as tough in this area. They seem to be concerned that anything that smacks of a UN-led, consensual, international approach would be seen as a sign of weakness. I do not know whether their position has changed, but I have a quote from a debate in the House of Lords, three years ago, in which the relevant Minister said that the Government believe that

"a duty to have regard to the need to safeguard and promote the welfare of children could severely compromise our ability to maintain an effective asylum system and strong immigration control".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 17 June 2004; Vol. 662, c. 996.]

Unless the Minister can tell us that the Government's position has since changed, that quote provides the context for our considerations this morning. The Government seem to be saying that the rights of children in those circumstances take second place, and will do so indefinitely, to what they see as the benefits of having a strong system, and that the well-being of the child is somehow incompatible with having overall strength and resilience within the system. If that has changed, I am sure that the Minister will correct me and inform us more widely.

My second point follows on from a point that the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington made. I was pleased that she quoted my noble Friend Lord Avebury regarding the absence of published figures for children who have been detained for immigration purposes. I have done some research in this area, and there seems to be a reasonable consensus that the figure is about 2,000. It is extraordinary, however, that we do not have a reliable figure. I cannot believe that this is genuinely an area in which the costs of compiling that information are, as the Government would put it, disproportionate. There seem to be all kinds of Government statistics being compiled in all kinds of areas in which people might have only a passing interest in knowing the facts and figures, whereas this is a central area of public interest. It behoves the Government to do the research and make that information available.

I have tried hard to get an indication of the scale of the situation. According to the figures supplied to me, 540 children were released from detention centres in the last quarter of 2005, so the information is already two years out of date. That figure was an increase of 20 per cent. on the previous quarter. If those figures were representative, they would indicate rising numbers of children in the system and an upward trend over time. It is an extraordinary state of affairs that we have to speculate about this situation, which should be made transparent and obvious to anyone who takes an interest.

My third point is one that the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) touched on. As a mature and reasonably enlightened liberal democracy, we should look to learn best practice from other countries. The hon. Gentleman talked about the caseworker system in Sweden. Having a caseworker who can act as an advocate, provide legal representation, be a voice and give guidance to a child in those circumstances would be a wholly progressive step, and the Government should consider it in greater detail.

The Government talk about their "Every Child Matters" campaign, but if that is to be anything other than a slightly trite slogan, it must encompass children who are not British children within the mainstream education system. It must mean that literally every child has a set of rights and that we have a duty and obligation to them. It is on that basis that my party supports the "No Place for a Child" campaign of Save the Children, the Refugee Council and Bail for Immigration Detainees, which calls for alternatives to child custodies, such as granting such people bail, or having them attend reporting centres or stay in supervised community accommodation. The campaign also proposes a host of other measures that might lead to a more satisfactory resolution to this vexed issue than that which the Government have so far managed to achieve.

Damian Green (Ashford) (Con): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) on her introduction to the debate. It might surprise her to know that I agree with a degree of her analysis of the problem. I part company with her and the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Browne), however, on the idea that the debate is being driven by the tabloid press and by political leaders running before the tabloid press. The wider issue of immigration levels has become a matter of genuine concern for communities all over the country, not just those that are represented by Labour Members, as the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) pointed out. It is therefore imperative that mainstream, moderate, democratic politicians address this issue, because if we do not, we leave the field clear for unpleasant, racist extremist parties. That would be the worst of all worlds.

I agree particularly with the hon. Lady's points about the appalling inadequacy of the statistics on which public policy in this area should be based. She has clearly researched this area well, but I assure her that after two years of asking Home Office Ministers about statistics, facts and figures that I cannot believe that they do not know, I have a file in my office, which I am happy to share with her, full of answers containing phrases such as "this information is not collected centrally" and "this information can be collected only at disproportionate cost." A lot of that information concerns people whom the Government have locked up, such as foreign prisoners, and whether they have been moved to immigration detention centres, as well as aspects of the asylum system. I am frequently torn between concluding that the Government really do not know those figures, which is appalling, or that they do know and are not telling me, which is equally appalling. Neither conclusion is very palatable for Parliament or for confidence in the competence of the immigration system.

Mr. Steen rose—

Ms Abbott rose—

Damian Green: I will give way to my hon. Friend—no; ladies first.

Ms Abbott: On the issue of figures, I have a confession to make. When I came down from Cambridge, my first job was as a graduate trainee with the Home Office, and I assure the hon. Gentleman that the Home Office keeps millions of files full of figures. I would regard with a certain amount of scepticism any reply saying that a figure cannot be provided because of disproportionate cost.

Damian Green: I am glad that the hon. Lady has confirmed the scepticism that was already in my mind about whether the Home Office has that information.

Mr. Steen: My hon. Friend has forgotten about me.

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): No, the hon. Gentleman was replying to an earlier intervention.

Mr. Steen: I thought that he had finished.

I have had exactly the same problem, but I have also had the enhanced problem of receiving contradictory answers from the Home Office—some saying that it does not have the figures, and some saying that it has the figures but then giving the wrong ones. Is my hon. Friend aware that the Director of Public Prosecutions and the Home Office give completely different figures on convictions for trafficking offenders in this country? Therefore, even when we get figures, they are not the same or right. That is even more confusing.

Damian Green: I thank my hon. Friend for that cogent intervention. The more we delve into this matter, the more depressing the situation appears. I am sure that the Minister would like to address that.

I have some sympathy for the Minister, because there is a case for saying that in a system of controlled immigration we need to have the power to detain people at some point, and may need to detain families. As did other hon. Members, I visited Yarl's Wood, and, like any normal, civilised human being, I came away profoundly uneasy at the sight of young children behind bars, of doors being clanged shut and of jailers—that is what they are—with huge bunches of keys, yet behind those doors were children playing happily.

There is something about that situation that would give rise to a huge sense of unease in any civilised person. That is why many hon. Members rightly raised the prospect of alternatives. Many mentioned the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, which stated in its 1999 guidelines that detention should only be resorted to for a minimal period in cases of necessity. It also made a point that was made earlier about the UK Borders Act 2007. I moved amendments to the Bill, which, it should be said, were supported by Liberal Democrat Members, that would have applied the conditions of the Children Act 2004 to the Bill, but the Government rejected them partly for the reasons that were set out by the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington, and partly because they said that such conditions would render impossible the proper work of immigration officers. We doubted that on the grounds that the same duty is already applied to police officers who clearly have to make positive and occasionally coercive interventions against children. As it does not stop them doing their job, I was not convinced by the Government's arguments.

Nevertheless, even the UNHCR accepts that detention is needed in some circumstances. There are two central questions for the Minister to answer. Are we detaining as few children as possible for as short a time as possible, and are there alternatives to detention that would be equally effective?

The first question, which involves delays, is a long-standing problem of the whole asylum and, indeed, wider immigration system. Delay is still endemic. Asylum and immigration tribunals are overwhelmed because cases are not handled in the most efficient manner possible. Some of the victims of delay and incompetence are children, who are held in detention for far longer than I suspect even Ministers would wish to be the case.

I, too, have asked many parliamentary questions about Yarl's Wood. I was told that few children are held there for more than 28 days, but I doubted that response. Some of the evidence that has been produced today suggests that my scepticism was justified. It is clear that delays happen. They are part of a wider systemic problem. As was said earlier, Ministers talk tough but act ineffectually in this area.

The second big question is around potential options or proper alternatives to detention, which were discussed by the all-party group on refugees. I would like the Minister to deal particularly with two of the options that it mentioned. The Swedish option has already been discussed. Another option is electronic monitoring and tagging.

[Damian Green]

The UNHCR report on alternative detention notes that the 2001 Home Office evaluation of tagging in the criminal justice field stated that there was a 90 per cent. compliance rate among criminals. I am aware of recent research that is less positive about tagging, but I would be grateful if the Minister were to address it as a possible option. The point has been made that, of all the people who may be detained because of asylum and immigration matters, families are probably the least likely to abscond. Therefore, would tagging be effective?

The other alternative that I would draw to the Minister's attention is the work in Melbourne, Australia, of the Hotham Mission. I am sure that she is familiar with it, as everyone who deals with this area has been told that it works extremely well. It seeks to ensure a sound basis for improved welfare and to establish a safe environment for those who are the equivalents of those detained in this country. It houses 120 asylum seekers in 38 properties, provides support and runs a befriending programme.

Clearly, outcomes are important. The point about the Hotham Mission is that, of the people who had gone through the project, 43 per cent. received immigration status, 57 per cent. had their claims refused and left the country, and 0 per cent. absconded. That is a spectacular figure for this difficult area. If there is a project somewhere in the world in which 0 per cent. of people end up absconding, we should be looking hard at it.

Regardless of the wider immigration crisis, which shows no sign of improving, it ought to be easier to cope with the asylum system than it was a few years ago, as the numbers have come down—thankfully, largely because of the present absence of Balkan conflicts. I hope that the Government's refusal to insert a duty of care for children into the 2007 Act is not symbolic of their general attitude. As I said, I have some sympathy with the Minister, but I still need convincing that the Government are being either efficient or humane in their treatment of children in immigration detention.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Meg Hillier): I warmly congratulate my hon. Friend and neighbour, the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott), on securing this debate on this important subject. I believe we all agree that her contribution was thoughtful, thoroughly researched and, as usual on this issue, passionate. She has a strong track record on immigration issues in her half of Hackney and here in the House.

I am heartened that there seems to be consensus in the Chamber that this country needs a firm, fair and swift immigration process and policy. The hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Browne) asked whether the Government believe that we should have a strong immigration policy. Yes, we do, and that is one reason why we are unveiling changes. We are 100 or so days away from the new points-based system that will be launched in February, which will mean that only those whom we want to come to this country and contribute to it will be able to do so.

However, such a system will require enforcement. When I was first elected as a councillor in 1994 and first came across the issue of unaccompanied asylum-seeking children, I certainly did not think that I would stand here one day as part of a Government who have to make tough decisions about detention, including detention of children. It is not something that we aim to do but something that we have to do as part of the immigration process.

I shall outline some of the things that the Government are doing to try to reduce the number of children in detention, and measures that we have taken to improve their welfare. I shall also do my best in the time available to answer the many points raised, particularly by my hon. Friend, but by others as well.

The Minister for Borders and Immigration takes the matter seriously. Indeed, when he was putting together the UK Borders Bill and taking it through Parliament, he listened closely to what representatives of refugee and children's organisations said was needed to ensure that children in detention received greater support and care. For two years now we have had in the Border and Immigration Agency—formerly the immigration and nationality directorate—a children's champion. In June this year, my hon. Friend unveiled the children's code. If I have time, I shall go into it, but, as it has been published, I may have to skip over it more quickly than I would like.

Ms Abbott: If the Government are concerned about how children are treated in immigration detention, why do they not simply extend the provisions of the relevant children's legislation to children in detention? Surely that would be the easiest way. As has been pointed out, those provisions do not hamper the job of the police, so why should they hamper immigration officers?

Meg Hillier: My hon. Friend raises an interesting point. I hope that I will be able to answer some of those questions as I go through the matters that have been raised. The Home Office has attempted to ensure that the Border and Immigration Agency is much more focused on the welfare not just of children but, generally, of all the people for whom it is responsible. We have made some progress.

We are considering alternatives. I highlight particularly the Clannebor project in Yorkshire, where specialists work closely with families. Case conferences include the parents of the children in discussions about options for their going home voluntarily. We will be starting a similar pilot in Kent at the end of this year. The pilots take account of the Australian model to which the hon. Member for Ashford (Damian Green) referred, and we hope that they will lead to solutions and a reduction in the number of children in detention.

It is worth highlighting that children are in detention because their parents are at risk of absconding, or are on the point of removal. The parents have the opportunity of leaving voluntarily so that their children would not have to be in detention.

Ms Abbott: I seek the Minister's assurance that she is not saying that children are being detained because of the faults, crimes or suspected criminal activities of their parents.

Meg Hillier: I am happy to clarify that. The limited circumstances in which children may be detained under immigration legislation powers are when they are part of a family group for which detention is considered necessary. Occasionally and exceptionally, unaccompanied children may be detained, perhaps overnight, when there is no other alternative for their care, perhaps because social services could not be contacted. That would happen only in extremis, and for their safety. The general principle, as I am sure my hon. Friend appreciates, is that detention is used only when necessary, and that is especially true for families with children.

The detention of families with children is, naturally, regrettable. No one wants that to happen, and the Government do not detain such families lightly. Such detention is emotive, but it happens and will continue to happen when those who have no right of stay in this country will not leave voluntarily. That is the point about parental responsibility. We would prefer families that have no lawful basis for staying in our country to accept that fact and leave voluntarily but, sadly, they do not.

My hon. Friend rightly raised the issue of vexatious judicial reviews, and it is worth noting that there are about 80 judicial reviews a month of people in detention, not all of them with children, but the Government have never lost a case on the policy of having children in detention. Regrettably, that often delays a family's departure and means that children are in detention longer.

Jeremy Corbyn: The Minister must share my concern about the quality of much legal representation, particularly in the initial stage of immigration. Does she believe that some cases have poor representation throughout, and that cases that could have been successful are often lost because of that representation? Should that not be looked at?

Meg Hillier: My hon. Friend raises an important point that I identified early on as a constituency MP. The quality of advice that people receive, not only on immigration but on other issues, is variable. I hope that the changes in legal aid support and the quality controls that the Government are trying to establish will also help in the immigration area. He is right to identify that better advice and support can help in a number of ways, not least to ensure that families are held in detention no longer than necessary.

Although families may be detained under the same criteria as individuals—while identity or claims are established, because there is a risk of absconding, as part of a fast-track asylum process, or to effect removal—it is not usual for them to be detained for more than a few days at a time, and they are accommodated in dedicated family rooms—[Interruption.].

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. Two hon. Members are talking rather loudly while the Minister is addressing questions that other hon. Members have asked. Perhaps they will desist from doing so.

Meg Hillier: The hon. Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen) asked whether it is possible to visit detention centres, and has heard that other hon. Members have done so. The Government are always happy to facilitate hon. Members to make such visits.

Mr. Steen: Does that include the immigration service?

Meg Hillier: The Border and Immigration Agency and the Home Office would be happy to facilitate a visit if the hon. Gentleman wants that.

Detention of families is kept to a minimum, and my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington asked about the number of children detained after 28 days, and particularly about ministerial involvement. I will look into that further, and write to her or perhaps ask the Minister for Borders and Immigration to take up the matter. She made a fair point.

That brings me to the general issue of figures. We know how many children are in our detention estate at any one time, but that changes daily, which is often a reason for confusion because figures change as people are removed from the country. I acknowledge that there is still room for improvement in the published statistics, and emphasise that the Government are keen to be as open and transparent as possible.

We have introduced a number of measures better to identify, locate and refer children who are not in the estate, to which the hon. Member for Totnes referred. We are working on that, but children not in the estate are ultimately the responsibility of local authorities. I remember the issue from 1994 when I was first elected to a London borough council and became responsible for social services. It is worrying, and a balance must be struck between keeping children safe but not locking them up when in care, and ensuring that they have relevant support. I emphasise that since 2000, when I was a councillor, the Government have set up a network of authorities to provide better support because of the pressure to ensure that local authorities develop a reservoir of expertise.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to guardian ad litem, but children in detention are with their parents, and it is worth remembering that parents have ultimate responsibility for their children. It is not the Government's intention to separate children from their parents, and that is why, sadly, children go into detention more often than we like.

We are worried about children who go missing from care, and we are working on that with other Departments. It is not easy to solve the problem, but the introduction of identity cards, locking a child's identity clearly to themselves, will help, particularly where trafficking is concerned. I see informal adoptions in my constituency, and it is difficult to know where all the children have come from. Identity cards will be a major step, and I look forward to the support of the hon. Gentleman and his party as that matter progresses.

My hon. Friend was critical of the Government. She rightly highlighted that these children are exposed and vulnerable, but emphasised that they are with their parents. They are not taken away from their parents, and it is worth remembering that. The number of children detained at the longer end of the scale—for up to three months—has fallen, and we do not want it to be so high, which is why we have introduced the pilots. I will write to her with more details if she wants me to as time is short.

Every child in the system will have a single case owner so that families and individuals claiming asylum will have better support to progress their case more quickly. Delay is one of the main reasons for children being held.

I want to touch on medical treatment, which was raised by my hon. Friend and my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn). Children have access to GP-level services with ready access to secondary and tertiary health care services in the community. All removal centre health care providers are in the process of registering with the Healthcare Commission, and will provide fuller oversight and the sort of accountability that my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington rightly raised. That is an essential part of the system.

Children in detention are subject to the Children Act 2004, which the courts have said must apply, subject to practical constraints that inevitably arise from the fact of detention. For example, two social workers from Bedfordshire work full time at Yarl's Wood to ensure that the Act is adhered to. We address psychological and health needs by providing an independent social work and health assessment for children detained with their families, as well as ensuring that everyone has access to GP screening, if they want that, in the first 24 hours.

I shall not have time to go through all the issues at Yarl's Wood, but the barred gate has been removed, and a normal door has been installed, which addresses one of the points raised. Changes have been made to ensure that children at Yarl's Wood receive a better service, but I am keen to continue the dialogue with my hon. Friend and to keep her appraised of that progress.

In summary, we have a central dilemma. Some people seeking asylum must be removed because they will not leave voluntarily. We do not want children to be detained, but should we separate them from their parents? I do not believe that children should be released into local authority care and separated from their parents. Our option is slightly better, but our main aim is to reduce the number of children in detention through the pilots that I outlined, and we use tagging when that is appropriate. I hope that those measures will reduce the number of children detained unnecessarily.

Local Government (Norfolk)

11 am

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): I welcome the opportunity to debate this important subject and I look forward to being under your chairmanship, Mr. Olner. I also thank the Minister for being here to answer our questions, because he had to rearrange his diary to do so, and I am particularly grateful to him because he is the Minister responsible for this issue. A number of colleagues from Norfolk are also here. The hon. Member for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Wright) contacted me to say that he is unable to be here because of a Select Committee commitment, but the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) may grace us with his presence later.

I initiated the debate to express my concerns about the Government's proposal to have the boundary committee consider a unitary authority based on an expanded Norwich city, and about the consequent changes for the county and district councils in Norfolk. The view in Norfolk—certainly among Labour members in Norwich—is that a Norwich unitary authority is a done deal and that Ministers have already made their decision. Indeed, so confident is Norwich city council that, in September, it appointed a director of transformation—that is almost like something out of J. K. Rowling's "Harry Potter"—on a modest stipend of £90,000 a year. We should remember that that was before the Local Government and Public Involvement in Health Act 2007 had passed through the House. The director's remit was to help to "shape and deliver" a new unitary council—no ifs, no buts.

My purpose this morning is to impress on the Minister that there is, to say the least, a considerable lack of support in Norfolk—and, I suspect, limited support in Norwich—for his specific unitary proposal. There are serious questions about the nature of the proposal, the impact on local communities and the danger that the county of Norfolk as an administrative unit will be abolished. Whatever people's views on the issue, however, perhaps the most fundamental question is about democratic accountability.

I remind the Minister that for many of us in Norfolk this latest initiative follows the failure of Norwich's bid this summer to become a unitary authority. It failed to meet the Government's own criteria, and that was thought to be due to the inherent weaknesses of the city's current boundaries. The Government have therefore now decided to move the goalposts and establish a unitary authority based on an enlarged city boundary.

I represent the constituency of Mid-Norfolk, which is shaped rather like a large banana resting on top of Norwich. There are two district councils in my constituency—Breckland to the west and Broadland to the east, and local government in both gets high marks for council tax and the delivery of services. Parishes in Broadland are divided between the constituency of Norwich, North and my constituency, so I must declare an immediate interest.

Following the original bid earlier this year, I did not receive one letter, telephone call or e-mail supporting the bid for a Norwich unitary authority and the possible impact on Broadland district council or Norfolk county council. In fact, quite the opposite happened, and I received hundreds of letters, phone calls and e-mails opposing the proposals. Every town and parish council formally objected, and those formal objections will be on the files in the Minister's Department. Those objections were based on a perceived threat to county and district councils that were efficient, gave value for money and which the Government themselves rated highly for the delivery of services. Sadly—this is sad—the perception of Norwich city council was the opposite, and the Audit Commission qualified its accounts in 2004-05 and 2005-06.

Local Norfolk opinion was best summed up in an editorial in the Eastern Daily Press on 23 June 2007:

"We have long believed that there is no need for the change. Norfolk County Council is a four star authority, while Broadland has the best record in the country on such issues as recycling. Why, then, hand the keys to a council"—

Norwich—

"far beneath the Premier League on performance and service delivery?"

That opinion is as relevant today as it was in June. My concern is that the Minister has decided to use the model of a Norwich unitary authority as a baseline to reorganise local government in Norfolk, and that his unofficial riding instructions to the boundary committee have ruled out the status quo.

Mr. Richard Bacon (South Norfolk) (Con): As my hon. Friend mentions concerns about Norwich, will he reflect on the opinion of the Audit Commission, which said that Norwich city council's financial management was not yet fit for purpose?

Mr. Simpson: My hon. Friend is a distinguished member of the Public Accounts Committee and has emphasised the point that I, sadly, am trying to make, which must bear heavily on the mind of the Minister, who is, of course, a former Treasury Minister.

I urge the Minister to think again. There are two obvious reasons why the status quo should be considered and, indeed, act as the template. First, we have a documented, agreed set of statistics on council tax, performance, delivery and accountability, with which theoretical options can be tested. Secondly, given Norwich city council's at best uneven track record, it is surely absurd to use an underperforming model as the template. We would not do that in business, and my experience of the Ministry of Defence is that such a model would go into what the Army calls the "laugh and tear up file".

Mr. Charles Clarke (Norwich, South) (Lab): I would be grateful if the hon. Gentleman could clarify whether he is opposed to unitary authorities across Norfolk in all circumstances or just to the procedures and processes in this particular case. I have several comments to make later about some of his earlier remarks, but what is his stance on unitary status for Norfolk full stop?

Mr. Simpson: I do not want to be discourteous, but if the right hon. Gentleman had read the Eastern Daily Press over the past few weeks, he would have seen what my position is. I happen to be in favour of the status quo, although other people have different views, which is perfectly legitimate. There is a discussion to be had about the principle, to which the right hon. Gentleman will undoubtedly return in a minute, but I am concerned both with the principle and the processes.

Mr. Clarke: Is the hon. Gentleman in favour of a two-tier system, not a unitary system, in all circumstances?

Mr. Simpson: I do not know, frankly. I want to have an honest debate in which all the options are under consideration. As I have tried to emphasise, it is obvious that the template must be the status quo, but it is not on the agenda. There are perfectly legitimate reasons for considering different variations as regards unitary authorities, but the status quo must be considered as a template or an option.

We now come to consider and question the process by which the Minister seeks a unitary solution. He is minded to ask the boundary committee to consider the issue. Much to the surprise of many of us in Norfolk, the boundary committee, under its chairman, Mr. Max Caller, has begun the process. To date, it has received no written terms of reference from the Minister, but that did not prevent it from beginning consultation even before the Local Government and Public Involvement in Health Act 2007 had been passed in both Houses. Indeed, it has effectively issued an ultimatum to the county and district councils to produce proposals based on a unitary model by the end of the month. They have been told that the status quo is not an option, and non-participation will mean non-consideration.

By means of letters and telephone calls, I have attempted to establish the boundary committee's remit. My noble Friend Baroness Shephard of Northwold attempted to do the same in a debate in the other place on 12 November, as did my noble Friend Lord MacGregor of Pulham Market in a debate on 14 November. Neither obtained a satisfactory answer. The point that they made, and my point now, is that the boundary committee's demand for councils to produce proposals by the end of the month, when there are no ministerial terms of reference, may, as my noble Friend Lord MacGregor put it, be illegal—and it is certainly, to say the least, bad practice. Will the Minister confirm that as yet there are no terms of reference for the boundary committee? If so, will he advise the boundary committee to cease its harassment of our councils and remove the arbitrary deadline of the end of the month? I was told by one boundary committee official that the purpose of the deadline is to enable the boundary committee to consider proposals according to a timetable.

I have used the term "harassment" advisedly. All the Norfolk councils that I have spoken to have said that the chairman of the boundary committee and his officials have been very pro-active, and rather menacing. Indeed, in an interview that the chairman gave to the Eastern Daily Press on 6 November, the reporter noted that local council leaders and officers had been told that he "carries a big stick" and that non-co-operation in the process is not an option. Despite still being opposed to the unitary authority case, those district and county councils have been forced to prepare options that are not their first choice, have serious cost implications and are not supported by any public mandate.

To illustrate how biased the process is, I shall quote from an interview that the chairman of the boundary committee gave to the BBC's "Politics Show" on 26 October, which can be found on its website:

"Q: Is retaining a two tier authority an option? Because many people claim that this exercise is now a paper one and that a unitary future is inevitable.

[Mr. Keith Simpson]

> A: Well a lot will depend on the terms of the invitation that the Secretary of State gives the Boundary Committee but we think we are going to be invited to propose a pattern of unitary local government for the county, and the only way we would not propose such a pattern is if we were convinced that the two tier system was better than any unitary proposal that we could come up with. And I honestly think that's unlikely."

So it has already been decided—that is a fact—by the chairman of the boundary committee, before his terms of reference have even arrived.

It seems to me once again that that creates fertile ground for a future judicial review, and the involvement of the Audit Commission. It is almost Alice in Wonderland. Hon. Members will recall the Queen of Hearts who was always screaming "Sentence first—verdict afterwards." Whatever the merits or demerits of the local government reorganisation for Norfolk, we can be sure of one thing: the people of Norfolk will be consulted only on the margins. In the BBC interview that I mentioned, the chairman of the boundary committee said:

> "It's not the function of the Boundary Committee to hold a referendum, that's not the way we do business. We want to know that there is a broad cross section of support but that's not the same as a referendum. And it's evidence and argument that we're interested in rather than five thousand emails all saying the same thing."

Up to a point I agree with that. We have all been subject to a mass lobby. However, it seems to me that that is the attitude of a non-elected functionary who has already made up his mind, rather than someone approaching an issue with an open mind.

I remind the Minister and the chairman of the boundary committee that democracy matters. In fact, that statement is the logo displayed proudly at the bottom of the boundary committee's notepaper. The trouble is that public opinion will count only in a very general, loaded way. As far as I am concerned, democracy counts when we have elections and issues are placed before the people. In the May local elections my party took seats from other parties in Broadland, and the same thing happened in South Norfolk. That was achieved on a platform of opposing the Norwich unitary authority. That is cause and effect. It matters. It is direct democracy—not a lot of sham workshops, stakeholders' meetings and what Baroness Hollis of Heigham, opposing a referendum in Norfolk in a debate in the other place on 8 October, at column 72, called a "reiterative process"—whatever that consists of.

The Minister and the chairman of the boundary committee must face facts. There is no majority constituency in Norfolk for their proposal. Indeed, the more coverage the fixed proposal receives, the more it arouses the opposition of Norfolk people. At a purely constituency level, I should be very grateful for the publication by the Eastern Daily Press of the enlarged boundaries of a greater Norwich. The reaction that I have received has been considerable. I have not even touched on the costs incurred in the exercise. Norfolk county council has already allocated £250,000. The borough council of King's Lynn and West Norfolk has allocated £200,000, South Norfolk council £200,000 and Norwich a minimum of £90,000. What about the time, effort and morale of officers working in the district and county councils?

We have been here before. The Minister may not be aware of it, but for the past six years the primary care trusts have been organised and reorganised from one to six and back to one. In the latest attempt of the Norfolk primary care trust to rationalise local community hospitals it was forced by public opinion to beat a retreat. I am grateful that the right hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke) is here, because I also want to refer to the example of the proposed amalgamation of police forces—Norfolk, Suffolk and Cambridgeshire. We were told that it was a done deal. All the arguments stacked up. It would happen. Everything was prepared. Thanks not least to the efforts of my hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Bacon), the right hon. Member for Norwich, South was sadly—I mean that—forced to resign as Home Secretary, and within a week his successor had said that amalgamations would not take place. How does the Minister think the people of Norfolk and Norwich will trust Government proposals such as the present ones? Nothing is set in concrete.

In case I am being too parochial, let us consider what is happening elsewhere in the country, with the process of forcing unitary authorities on counties. In Cornwall, there is chaos and confusion; in Cheshire, there was a judicial review, which was rejected, but a right of appeal has been granted; in Bedfordshire, councils have been set at each other's throats, and there are calls for judicial review. None of the time lines laid down by Ministers has been adhered to. That relates back to the time line set by the boundary committee.

Given the present dog's breakfast, I suggest to the Minister first that he should establish and publicise the terms of reference for the boundary committee, taking into account the majority desire across Norfolk for the status quo—he should recognise that as an option that must be considered. It might turn out not to be the option that he, or, indeed, the majority of Norfolk opinion, goes for, but it should be considered seriously. Secondly, I suggest that he should advise the chairman of the boundary committee to remove an artificial deadline for the submission of proposals by councils, given that there are no terms of reference. The deadline of the end of the month must be removed. Thirdly, he should establish a proper way by which any proposals may be tested against public opinion—what Norfolk people want or specifically do not want. That should encompass Norfolk across the board—the people of Norwich, Cromer, Aylsham, Watton and King's Lynn all have a right to know. It is just dawning on people beyond greater Norwich that the Minister's proposals will have a direct impact on them.

This is an issue on which different MPs and parties will hold different views, but there is a suspicion in Norfolk that a done deal has already been accepted, and that Norfolk will just have to accept what is given to it. The chairman of the boundary committee, with his experience in Haringey, may think that we are a bunch of hicks. Let me tell him that we are not. Democracy matters. Norfolk will not let itself be abolished.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. A number of hon. Members wish to participate in the debate and I want to bring everyone in if I can, but I must warn hon. Members that I intend to call the first winding-up speech at 11.55 am.

Mr. Charles Clarke (Norwich, South) (Lab): I am grateful to you, Mr. Olner, for that comment and to the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) for organising the debate—it is an important subject and I am glad that he has done so. I am also grateful to the Minister for the decisions that he took in the summer to deal with what was a long-standing and significant issue—namely, the absence of unitary status for a great city such as Norwich.

I begin from the position of believing that unitary authorities are, in principle, beneficial. There are a number of issues, such as planning, transport and economic development, particularly in a growth area such as Norwich, which make it extremely important that there is a coherence rather than dislocation of public authorities. I could cite a great number of examples of discontinuities between the county and the city on important development issues around the city, but I do not wish to take up everyone's time. Those problems are acute because Norwich has been identified—rightly—as a major growth area for the coming period, and the large amount of economic development will involve matters relating to infrastructure. I profoundly believe that we will get more coherent, transparent and effective decisions if we have unitary local government, as in other parts of the country.

It would be bizarre if places such as Peterborough and Ipswich were to have unitary authorities, but cities such as Norwich did not. That is why I applaud the decisions taken by the Government and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government earlier this year, specifically regarding Norwich, because the difference between its municipal boundaries and its actual physical boundaries—the built up areas that fall within a number of hon. Members' constituencies—is greater than any in the country. That is a reflection of the fact that Norwich has been a growing city for decades, but the municipal boundaries have not changed to take account of it. The various inconsistencies are still more acute in Norwich than they would otherwise have been. I am glad that the Secretary of State decided to look at Norwich's situation and the case for unitary status on the basis of wider boundaries than were previously suggested, and that the Minister was able to carry through and announce that. I welcome those decisions.

I must contest the assertions made by the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk on popular support. It may seem strange to him, but we in Norwich also have elections. The elections that took place in Norwich on the same day as those in his constituency gave an overwhelming mandate for unitary status. The Labour party, the Green party and the Liberal Democrats were strong supporters of unitary status for the city of Norwich. Overwhelmingly, those parties make up the elected city council of Norwich. The Conservatives were against the proposal.

I am glad to tell the hon. Gentleman that I read the Eastern Daily Press every day. My problem with what he said arose from the fact that I could not draw out his position from his interviews with the paper, because it appeared a lack coherence. However, he has now made clear his opposition to unitary status in all circumstances.

Mr. Keith Simpson: I shall send the right hon. Gentleman a copy of the Eastern Daily Press. I have always said, as has been quoted, that I happen to be in favour of the status quo. It is as simple as that.

Mr. Clarke: I understand that, and it is what the hon. Gentleman told the Eastern Daily Press. The question that I asked was slightly different. I understand his argument—it is a traditional conservative argument, which says there should never be any change—and that he is in favour of the status quo. The question, which he was good enough to answer when I asked it earlier, was about whether he fundamentally believes that unitary status will be a good thing in future. The previous Conservative Government, as was clear from their dealings with boundary commissions, believed that there was a case for unitary status. His heroine, Baroness Thatcher, put forward changes that abolished urban counties for exactly the same reasons, so it was therefore not self-evident that a Conservative politician would be opposed to unitary status in all circumstances. I understand the conservative argument that there should be no change, but that is the issue I pursued, and I was grateful for his clarity and candour in response to my earlier questions.

My point is that there is strong support in the city of Norwich for unitary status for the city, contrary to what the hon. Gentleman said. If he looked at the business community and at a wide range of voluntary and community organisations, quite apart from votes cast at elections, he would see that there is strong support for the changes, and rightly so.

Mr. Simpson: Will the right hon. Gentleman remind the House whether Labour party election literature in Broadland and South Norfolk specifically supported unitary status during the last elections, and whether that was part of the manifesto?

Mr. Clarke: I do not recall the exact manifesto published in each ward in the city of Norwich, but it is clear, as the hon. Gentleman acknowledged, that the leadership of the Labour group on the city council and the Labour party said on many occasions that they strongly supported unitary status for the city. I believe that that was reported in the Eastern Daily Press. The Greens, to be fair them—I am not often fair to them—supported it, as did the Liberal Democrats who used to run the city council, as the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) will probably confirm. There is no doubt that there was a clear mandate on the issue in Norwich.

Finally, on the point the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk made about the done deal, he gently and kindly reminded me about police reorganisation, but I should remind him that the police authority in Norfolk and many others supported the changes, and that nothing is a done deal in politics until it happens. Anybody who suggests that it is a done deal is wrong. Rather, the Government, to whom I pay tribute, have recognised the case and appointed a series of independent individuals as part of a statutory process to look at the issues in detail. I am sure the Minister will describe that process when he responds. That is precisely what ought to happen, and what the Government ought to be commended for.

[Mr. Charles Clarke]

I wish that the hon. Gentleman would, unlike his colleagues, say that he welcomes the change, sees the benefits that might accrue, and put forward proposals. The leader of the county council in Norfolk—a Conservative—has made his proposals for, in this case, a unitary county, but he accepts the principle of unitary status. Other Conservatives are making similar arguments. The Conservative party would be best served if its elected representatives saw the merits of the case and engaged in a serious discussion about what is best for the future of the county in the same spirit as the Minister.

I am grateful that we are having this debate, and I hope that it will continue in a free and open way.

Norman Lamb (North Norfolk) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) on securing the debate. It is important, but I sense that there is a lack of opportunity for these issues to be discussed publicly in Norfolk and for public engagement.

My starting point is different from that of the hon. Gentleman. If I were starting with a clean sheet of paper, I would opt for a unitary authority. There is a case a for having one authority to deliver all services: there would be clarity so everyone would know which authority delivered local services, and one hierarchy, so it would be likely to be cheaper. There seems to be a compelling case on paper if one is starting afresh. However, we must ensure that there is clear evidence on which to build a case for change. Surely we are all in favour of evidence-based policy making. When I met the boundary committee, I naively put to it my presumption that it had clear evidence of the case for unitary authorities—namely, that they deliver better services with better co-ordination, that they are cheaper to run on the whole, and that they provide better value for money. The response that I received concerned me. The committee said that the evidence was pretty mixed. There is no clear evidence that unitary authorities deliver better services, better co-ordinated services or even better value for money.

If the Minister agrees that we should be engaging in evidence-based policy making, is there any justification for an incredibly expensive change that would use resources that are needed to deliver services to the people of Norfolk? On what evidence has he based his case if even the boundary committee says that there is no evidence? That seems to be absolutely fundamental.

The hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk mentioned health and social care. The Government made something of the fact that by last October Norfolk was close to achieving in health and social care what they call coterminosity. At long last the primary care trust, as the commissioner of health services, broadly matched the social services authority—the county council. The Government saw that as a good thing, and I agreed. There is a real problem with co-ordinating health and social care, and a horrible organisational divide between the two. It makes a lot of sense to have those services at the same organisational size when starting to try to integrate them. Six months later, the Government are talking about destroying all that. I find that utterly bizarre, if we are in favour of evidence-based policy making.

The process is horribly flawed. The initial process involved Norwich city council putting forward a bid for unitary status. Inevitably, it concentrated on its own concerns and the bid neglected the concerns and interests of the rest of the county—a completely flawed process. When the Government considered the bid, they reached the remarkable conclusion that they would reject the application that had been made but would approve in principle an application that had not been made and that they would do so without any evidence in favour of or opposing such an application. That is scandalous and completely contrary to evidence-based policy making.

The process is quite remarkable and bizarre. Local authorities have been asked to present their cases in principle for a unitary option for Norfolk before the terms of reference have been issued. No one would believe it if it were not happening. It is remarkable. Nevertheless, that is how the Government want to proceed. Local authorities are being put into a straitjacket. They feel that they have no option but to put forward proposals that they may not be convinced about and that will inevitably be rushed through. The time scale is utterly ludicrous.

On cost, over the summer I made requests under the Freedom of Information Act 2000 to Norfolk county council and Norwich city council. The two authorities have together spent £600,000 on the initial process at a time when services for elderly people in our county are being cut and when many of our schools need extra funding. How on earth can anyone justify spending £600,000 on an initial process when there is such a need for funding for services in a rural county such as Norfolk, which has serious problems with educational attainment? That is scandalous. Incidentally, that amount covers the start of the process. As the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk said, every authority is setting aside £100,000 or £200,000 to cover the main process. That beggars belief.

I have argued for a Norfolk convention. I do not want that to be a Liberal Democrat initiative or a Liberal Democrat-run idea. I want everybody to consider it seriously as a way forward. We should not have a political carve-up. We should engage the people in Norfolk and civic society in such judgments. Self-evidently, people should be able to consider the status quo option. It is extraordinary to rule out one option, particularly given the fact that there appears to be no evidence to support the idea of change. At the very least, the evidence is mixed.

At all costs, I oppose the concept of a political carve-up. I share the suspicion voiced by the hon. Gentleman: this is probably a done deal. I assume that Norwich city will get its unitary status whatever the people of Norfolk say. However, the criterion that we are told should apply—that any proposal should be supported by a broad cross-section of the community—will not be met. One can tell from hon. Members in the Chamber that the county's political leaders are all over the place, with varying views on the issue. There is no gathering of support for any unitary option.

What is happening is a democratic outrage. We must not have a political carve-up. We must slow the process down and allow proper consideration by the people of Norfolk. Those people should decide.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb). I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) on securing this important debate.

I was interested to hear the speech made by the right hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke). Norfolk has seven local authorities and, apart from one, they are all performing very well. The flaw of his argument about Norwich is that the council has failed consistently and is by far the worst performer of the seven authorities in Norfolk. As my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk pointed out, the Audit Commission was damning in its two reports on Norwich city council.

The city council failed in its bid for unitary status on all five criteria. The right hon. Member for Norwich, South talked about Peterborough and Ipswich, but they happen to be well-run authorities. In the wider counties that are involved, there is considerable support for unitary status for those councils. That support does not exist for Norwich's case. Norwich is entirely on its own in Norfolk. There may be some support in Norwich, but I doubt that it is substantial. If we consider the different organisations that cover Norfolk, there is no support for unitary status for Norwich.

I find it absolutely staggering that the boundary committee has received no terms of reference from Her Majesty's Government, but has begun preliminary work. It has said to the local government family in Norfolk, "Go out there, and try to come up with some solutions." As my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk pointed out, those organisations are being forced to spend substantial amounts of money on the process and the chairman of the boundary committee has been menacing and proactive. Based on everything that the chairman has said, one would conclude that it is already a done deal. Why should the local authorities in Norfolk have any dealings at all with the committee? It has no terms of reference, and I do not see why those authorities should engage with it in any way, shape or form.

Do we need change in Norfolk? The binary system that we have works well. Norfolk county council is a four-star council and has done extremely well. My local borough council, King's Lynn and West Norfolk, is a beacon authority. Its focus on regeneration, value for money and accountability is second to none in the country. It has delivered better services with a reduced council tax demand. Let us consider the other district councils. Great Yarmouth has improved hugely over the years. North Norfolk is a good council. There are also Broadland, Breckland and South Norfolk; we have some excellent councils in Norfolk. The current system is working well.

Could unitary government work in Norfolk? Of course it could in theory, but in practice I am persuaded that, because Norfolk is a large shire county, some of the functions performed by the county council can be carried out only on a county-wide basis, with one authority in strategic control of functions such as highways, education and social services. A county council is needed to provide that framework. However, functions such as housing, planning, environmental health, and regeneration could be carried out by the county council only at the expense of accountability and only in a remote way, which is why they should be performed at the local level. That explains why the binary system works well in a county such as Norfolk.

We have a dilemma, therefore. Norfolk county council is obviously too large to carry out the whole panoply of local government functions, yet the existing boroughs are far too small to become unitaries. The only way to move forward would be to have complete upheaval, so why change things? As my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk said, the proposals are entirely politically driven; there is no public support for them whatever.

As for cost I, too, have had a look at primary care trust reorganisation. Ten years ago, we had the Norfolk health authority, which itself was the consequence of a substantial number of earlier reorganisations. It was working very well, but the Government came along and said that health commissioning needed to be brought closer to the public, so they set up five or six PCTs across the county, all with their own chief executives, directors of finance, directors of corporate affairs and whole armies of bureaucrats. Ten years on, it was decided that that system was not working well, so we went back to the Norfolk health authority concept. In the meantime, various senior officials in the health service walked away into the sunlit uplands with redundancy packages of £300,000, £400,000 or £500,000, costing huge amounts. There was no consultation with the wider public.

I have been reading a report entitled "The 2006-07 DCLG Process for Creating New Unitary Authorities in England" that was prepared recently by Professor Michael Chisholm and Professor Steve Leach. In their conclusions, they were absolutely damning of the Government. They said:

> "The process is so flawed that it corrupts the body politic".

They also said that retrospective legislation was in principle pernicious and that the process was biased in favour of unitary outcomes. The Minister should read the report if he has not already done so, because it is extremely critical of what has happened so far.

Do we need any change? My strong view is that there is no such need at the moment, because the status quo works very well. Of course, if one were starting local government in the shire counties from scratch, one might well consider a unitary solution. The pragmatic approach, however, is to ask why something should be changed if it is not broken.

There was a quotation from a Government Minister in one of today's papers, which said:

> "The public hates the word 'reform'; people think that means changing things for the sake of it."

The proposals constitute just that: change for the sake of change, with absolutely no wider public support and with a Government organisation—the boundary committee— completely out of control.

I urge the Minister to listen to Norfolk MPs. We are saying, "By all means go ahead with the process, but please do not rule out consideration of the status quo."

11.43 am

Mr. Richard Bacon (South Norfolk) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham). I shall take up where he left off on the theme of change, because it seems to me that the proposals are just the latest example of an insatiable desire that affects all Governments to engage in fiddling and changing things. I shall examine that theme generically and discuss the lessons that can be learned for Norfolk.

Wherever proponents of change are found—in the private or public sectors—it can be useful to look at how the same issues emerge, the same dramatis personae take to the stage, and the same stratagems are employed to achieve change despite strong and often compelling arguments against it. That applies in activities as apparently diverse as mergers and acquisitions of commercial companies and in delivery of changes in the adult education system or in the tax and credit system—to take two examples purely at random. I do not know why the Minister smiles, because the record shows that a lot can be learned in both of those areas. He should know that better than most, but I shall not dwell on that subject. The delivery of new computer systems is another such activity, as are private finance initiatives and the conversion of mutual building societies into banks.

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. The hon. Gentleman is not discussing local government in Norfolk.

Mr. Bacon: Thank you, Mr. Olner. I was about to mention the reorganisation of local government. Whichever activity is under discussion, the proposed changes usually have certain common features. The benefits of the change are often questionable and unproven. It is worth saying at this point that one is not opposed to all change, in all circumstances, all the time. Nevertheless, the right hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke) correctly articulated the Conservative position, which is that, if change is not absolutely necessary, it is necessary not to change—not least because change can itself bring all kinds of unpredictable and undesirable consequences in its wake.

Mr. Charles Clarke: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that nevertheless, for my constituents in Norwich, South, it is indeed absolutely imperative to change, for the reasons that I set out?

Mr. Bacon: Not necessarily. The first thing that the citizens of Norwich need is a council that can look after their money properly, rather than one that, as the Audit Commission has said, is not fit for purpose. Once the council has got its basic management sorted out, it could think about other things, but it should put the tasks in the right order first. However, let me repeat that my party is not opposed to change in all circumstances.

Mr. Keith Simpson: My hon. Friend may not be aware of an article that was published in September in the Eastern Daily Press in which the right hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke) put forward his arguments in favour of unitary authorities. It illustrates the very point made by my hon. Friend. The right hon. Gentleman was quoted as saying:

"I think the position of the city council to reject a £20m investment in one of the areas of greatest need is educationally ignorant and particularly backward-looking. You have to question the seriousness of the city's unitary bid. People will look at the position the city council has taken and think—what is it doing turning £20m down?"

His assessment of his own city council is pretty abysmal, therefore.

Mr. Bacon: My hon. Friend makes the point very eloquently. As I was saying, a number of common themes emerge. One is the theme of huge financial costs, which are usually much larger than originally stated. Another is the presence of characters who stand to benefit from change whether or not the wider interests of the organisation and of its customers are served. Last is that of a jargon or patter that, at least superficially and on first hearing, makes what sounds like a convincing case for change.

It is no coincidence, therefore, that the proponents of change often adopt the same approach, in which the first tactic is to overstate the benefits. For example, most GPs say that it would have been better not to have proceeded with the NHS IT system, even though it promised huge benefits. Another example is that of mergers and acquisitions, most of which fail—although loads of people make money from them.

The second tactic is to understate the risks and costs. The Minister knows all about that from the example of individual learning accounts, which I mentioned earlier. And who would now doubt, despite the benefits that were touted at the time of demutualisation, that Northern Rock would have been better off had it remained a mutual building society rather than converting to a bank?

Another important tactic is to act very fast so that there is little time for those who doubt the wisdom of the proposal to examine the case against it. A good example of that is the tax credits mess, in which the timetable for testing whether it would work was compressed almost to the point of extinction. Many hon. Members have seen the results of that in their constituencies.

I am tempted to say that another common theme is emerging in cases in which there has been a mess: the presence of the Minister. I shall not say that, however, because it would do him a disservice. He was a Treasury Minister for many years, and I am told that once one puts on a Treasury hat one can never entirely take it off. I am hoping, therefore, that he will view the proposals with a very jaundiced eye—not because change is always bad, but because one should make the case for it stack up, which nobody has yet convincingly done.

The people who benefit from change go by different names. Sometimes, they are called merchant bankers and lawyers. They look for transaction fees. Sometimes, they are called chief executives—a phenomenon that is common to both the public and private sectors. On occasions, they stand to receive an enormous pay-off if they lose their positions, and so face the enticing prospect of financial independence for many years to come without the inconvenience of actually having to work. Sometimes, the people benefiting are called professors of local government, who receive commission for writing long and important reports. The people who lose are often the same, although with different names: council tax payers, shareholders or people who want their garbage collected once a week and find that that is not possible.

The last category is the cadre of professional explainers or witch doctors who explain how marvellous everything is going to be. Sometimes they are called PFI consultants; sometimes they are called financial PR consultants—I should declare an interest in that regard—and sometimes they are called Ministers. The key is to develop a convincing patter. Plausible examples are needed of how silly the present system is. An example might be that parish councils cut the grass, but district councils clean the pavements or county councils clean the roads. It might be that district councils collect waste but county councils dispose of it, or that counties deal with social services, whereas districts deal with housing.

The essential point about all these examples is that the proposals—if one can call them proposals in the absence of terms of reference—for local government change in Norfolk exhibit all these characteristics. The benefits are entirely theoretical. We can have a debate about the benefits, but as the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) said, they are benefits on paper. We have had loads of experience in this respect. If 25 reorganisations of the national health service since 1982 have taught us anything, it should be that organisational tinkering must be treated with great caution.

There are enormous risks. The creation of, say, four social services departments where there is currently one involves enormous risks. There is the potential nightmare of organisational change, with vulnerable children—goodness knows, we have had experience of that issue in Norfolk—falling through the gaps in the new organogram, at a time when we have barely digested the changes caused by the merger of educational and social services for children into a new department.

The cost estimates vary, but they have been put conservatively at £100 million. I should like to know where that money is coming from. We have just had a very tight settlement through the comprehensive spending review. Why should the poor council tax payer stump up for what are at best theoretical benefits? For that matter, why should the central Government taxpayer stump up—after all, they are mostly the same people—when there are so many better things, as the hon. Member for North Norfolk pointed out, on which we desperately need to spend money?

In any case, those are conservative estimates. By how much will we see the costs explode? The largest component of the reorganisation of the police service in Norfolk, Suffolk and Cambridgeshire proposed by the right hon. Member for Norwich, South—the cost was £88 million—was merging the IT, at a time when people were saying that they wanted more police officers. How much will it actually cost to merge the IT of the different local authorities in Norfolk? No matter which proposal is chosen, we have to have the status quo as an option.

Of course there are characters around who stand to benefit from the process of change, whether the wider interests of the organisation and its customers are served or not. If we had several unitary councils, there would be several new social services directors, education directors—call them what you will; even with the merger of children's services, there would be new senior staff—and directors of planning and transportation. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) mentioned the transformation director, on a stipend of £90,000. How much transformation we get for 90,000 quid remains to be seen. The answer is probably not much. If, however, we have a unitary council, there will be a number of highly paid officers taking enormous redundancy packages, as we have already seen in relation to primary care.

Once again, we have seen the tactic of acting very fast so that there is little time for those who doubt the wisdom of the proposal to examine the case. The chairman of the boundary committee is going around prejudging what form of government will emerge from the process in a way that is possibly unlawful, as we have heard, and certainly dangerous for democracy and consultation. Astonishingly, councils are expected to provide intelligent answers on local government reorganisation when they have not even been told what the question is.

Finally, a jargon or patter is needed that will at least superficially, on first hearing, make what sounds like a convincing case for change. Fortunately, that is not my job. I await a reply from the Minister, but I remain to be convinced.

Mr. Christopher Fraser (South-West Norfolk) (Con): I am conscious that only two or three minutes are available to me so I will keep my remarks brief. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) on initiating the debate, which is timely in that we want to get things right for the people of Norfolk.

Does the Minister agree with me that the central aims when determining local government structure should be strengthening local services, bringing decision making closer to the people and improving efficiency? The Conservative party put those three issues to the electorate in Norfolk at the last local elections and received a substantial mandate.

Does the Minister agree that restructuring councils into fewer authorities than the eight that currently exist will create bodies too large to deliver the standard of local services that local people have come to expect within the current structure? That is a point lost, I hasten to say, on the right hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke), who has chosen to leave the debate at this stage. I am sure that we will take that point up with him afterwards.

I have various questions that I should like to put to the Minister quickly. I put it on the record that if he cannot give us responses in his closing remarks, I shall be very pleased if he responds to me in writing. Why is the status quo in terms of two-tier working not an option for Norfolk? When is it anticipated that the boundary committee will be given its terms of reference? What, if any, mandate does the boundary committee have to require councils to engage in a process before receipt of the terms of reference? Subject to the response to the two previous questions, is it realistic and acceptable for the boundary committee to hold local authorities to a submission date of the end of November if it will not receive its terms of reference by that date?

Can the Minister give an insight into any predetermined outcomes, especially with regard to the number of unitary authorities that would be acceptable for Norfolk as a county? If there is no predetermined number, will he provide assurance that all unviable proposals will be discounted after initial consideration in order to avoid the unnecessary use of local authorities' scarce resources?

What is the status of Norwich's bid? Is a unitary Norwich a predetermined outcome? Is the approach being taken with regard to Norfolk a precursor to the adoption of that approach in other two-tier areas? If not, will the Minister explain why that approach is deemed appropriate for Norfolk in isolation?

Given that the potential reorganisation is imposed rather than requested, will funding be made available to support reorganisation costs? How important are community identity and public opinion when compared with affordability and value for money? Is the review constrained by the Norfolk boundary determined by the boundary committee? Is the Minister willing to meet representatives from the authorities in Norfolk that are working up models in order to discuss their proposals?

From discussions with local residents, there appears to be little appetite for wholesale reorganisation and the implicit costs. However, we have been told by the boundary committee that public opinion is but one consideration and in no way an overriding one. Can the Minister confirm to what extent public opinion will be allowed to influence the decision on the local government review in Norfolk? I look forward to a written response to all those questions if the Minister cannot answer them in full today.

Paul Holmes (Chesterfield) (LD): All hon. Members who have spoken so far are from Norfolk and obviously have much more detailed knowledge of local circumstances than me or the speakers who are likely to follow. I congratulate the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) on securing the debate and on an excellent, detailed exposition of the facts. The one point that was slightly non-factual but on which I agreed with him wholeheartedly came when he referred to the Alice in Wonderland style of the process—sentence is passed first and the evidence is looked for afterwards. That analogy certainly appeals to me. I made that comparison quite recently in the House when debating the rather strange, Alice in Wonderland way in which this place often works.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the boundary committee logo, which is the statement "Democracy matters", and asked, quite appositely, how that could be when in a review such as this, the views of local people and the various local councils involved were ridden over roughshod or ignored completely. He described the process as a dog's breakfast, talking about the cost when it is supposed to save money, about the problems of judicial reviews across the country in similar circumstances, about the confusion that arises and about the timelines and time scales that simply are not being met.

The right hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke) made a legitimate point from a different perspective; it is possible to see a logical case for cities being unitary authorities. In my county of Derbyshire, some years ago, when a Government of a different complexion tried to impose unitary authorities, the compromise arrived at was that Derby City would become a unitary and the rest of the county would continue with the two-tier county and district or borough structure.

My hon. Friend the Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) made many valid points. As he said, if we were starting with a clean sheet—starting afresh—we might well be able to see the logic of a unitary system. Other hon. Members made that point, too. However, we are not starting with a clean sheet; we are not starting afresh. The current situation has developed over a long time and is not the clear-cut situation that we would have if we were drawing up plans for something from the beginning.

My hon. Friend asked where the evidence was for going through the process and for the conclusion that we are told we will reach even before the process has begun, which is a unitary system. He made a number of telling points when he spoke with the boundary committee, asking what the evidence was for the process, what the benefits for co-ordination would be and where value for money would be gained. The boundary committee said, "Well, actually evidence isn't conclusive on that at all." In that case, why are we going down that expensive, time-consuming, frustrating road in the first place, especially when, as several hon. Members have pointed out, we are facing a considerable squeeze on Government finance that will get much worse in the next three years under the common spending round that has just been announced?

The Government asked for proposals to be submitted before the terms of reference were even laid out. All the authorities involved were supposed to propose their ideas for a costly upheaval and reorganisation without knowing on what grounds they would be judged. We have come across that all too often in various government reorganisation schemes. The point was made several times that the time scale had been rushed.

My hon. Friend made another telling point. He had found out by means of a freedom of information request that two of the authorities involved had already spent more than £500,000 on initial preparations alone. If we add in the cost of all the other authorities' initial preparations and of the whole process, if we continue down that road, a very considerable amount of money will have been wasted on a bureaucratic process that is supposed to benefit the council tax payers of Norfolk.

I was particularly impressed by the suggestion of a Norfolk convention, to which I shall return, but all options should be considered. How can a genuine consultation be held if some options, such as the status quo, are ruled out from the start? My hon. Friend spoke of the democratic outrage at how we have gone about the matter.

Mr. Charles Clarke: Before he finishes, can the hon. Gentleman clarify the Liberal Democrats' national policy on unitary local government, particularly in cities but also more generally?

Paul Holmes: I shall certainly do so. It is on the very next page of my notes. From my point of view, both personally and as a spokesman for my party, what should we do? As has been said, we should not start from here. The Redcliffe-Maud report of 1966 to 1969 recommended a completely single-tier unitary system. That was rejected, and the Local Government Act 1972 dumped the issue. There was a major upheaval of local government in 1972; a dozen county councils disappeared and lots of changes were made. It was one of the greatest upheavals of local government in our country's history, but it dumped the proposals of the Redcliffe-Maud report. Had the bullet been bitten back then, when a major national review was occurring, we would not be in this position today.

In the 1980s and 1990s, the situation continued. We had a total of 35 years of tinkering, change and messing at the edges from different Governments of all complexions who never tackled the system fundamentally. During those years, I have seen the matter from all angles and from the grass roots. I spent four years as a parish councillor and 12 years as a borough councillor, and I worked for a county council as a teacher for 22 years. I have seen the workings of local government from every possible angle other than city government. I remember well the pressure from the Conservative Government in the 1990s to impose unitary authorities. It caused huge dissension in Derbyshire, just like the dissension we are seeing throughout the country and in Norfolk today. The outcome was a unitary city, with the rest of the county continuing under a two-tier system.

I favour unitary authorities for the logical principle involved, but the issue is how to get there and whether it can be done satisfactorily in the situation we are in. I certainly favour smaller unitary authorities. When the Derbyshire argument was going on many years ago, I argued not for a county-wide unitary authority but for smaller ones in such areas as north-east Derbyshire. We are often told by academics and Government thinkers that that is not efficient. It is very democratic, and it can also be very efficient. I have visited small towns in the USA and all the Scandinavian countries where it works. In Norway, a town with as few as 20,000 inhabitants runs everything—police, health, fire brigade and education—not just the standard local authority services run by a district council in this country. It can be done on a smaller scale, and democracy may well be worth an extra premium if it comes with local accountability.

If a Government of any party believe that unitaries are the way forward, they should say so in their general election manifesto and go on to introduce legislation to that effect. Redcliffe-Maud provided such an opportunity 40 years ago, but no Government has done so since then. The 2005 Labour manifesto did not mention restructuring as such and did not mention the imposition of unitary authorities in any way. It said:

> "We will ensure that councils are organised in the most effective way to lead and support local partnerships and deliver high-quality services".

It referred to

> "streamlining administrative structures while promoting decision making at the level that will make a difference."

It was totally open-ended and non-committal about what that process would involve. That cannot be seen as a democratic mandate to impose unitaries in various hand-picked areas of the country.

If a Government believe that local communities should decide, they should have a proper process to allow that. That is certainly not what is happening with the process that is under way in various counties, which involves preconceived Government preferences and rules out some options, such as the status quo. It asks for proposals without stating the terms of reference and conditions by which they will be judged. It gives the power to unelected, unaccountable boundary committees. That is not the way to do it. The communities affected should decide what system of local government they want.

The proposed Norfolk convention is an echo of what happened in Scotland, where the Scottish convention led to devolution and the Scottish Parliament. It has involved all parties and extensive consultation in the community, and it took some time to achieve an answer that had widespread support across Scotland—from the Scottish people; we shall leave aside England. The proposal for a similar convention in Norfolk is excellent and should be employed throughout the country wherever such measures are proposed. Preconceived ideas should not be imposed from the top, there should not be a closed list to pick from and, above all, the local community should be involved in maximum consultation, rather than the sham that is taking place at the moment.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): It is a pleasure to be here under your chairmanship, Mr. Chope. If I did not know the Minister better, I would be inclined to say that he should simply stand up and give in. If this were a decently refereed boxing match, it would have been stopped long ago on points. The tidal wave of good sense that has come his way in expressions of huge concern about the proposals that we are debating would convince any neutral observer that something has gone badly wrong with the process of government for us to be here discussing them in this way. I should be grateful for a few minutes to illustrate some of my concerns.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) on his opening speech, which touched on many of the points that have been amplified during this debate. I thought that he spoke with suppressed outrage on behalf of his constituents and, I suspect, the vast majority of the people of Norfolk. He spoke of his constituents' views, expressed both to him and through the ballot box, and of the quality of performance of local authorities, which may be swept away in a reorganisation. He spoke of the bullying—let us be plain about the word—of the boundary committee in how it started and has gone about its work. He spoke about the concerns that this might be a done deal, raised the issue of whether the people would be consulted and mentioned the boundary committee's motto, "Democracy matters". Well, we shall see.

The right hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke) spoke of his belief in the importance of the unitaries in Norfolk. He is entitled to do so—anyone is entitled to put their view in this debate—but neither he nor the council that he is promoting are entitled to be the tail wagging the dog. There is neither the numerical majority to do that, nor, as my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) made clear, the moral authority, given the quality of the councils being wagged by the unfortunate tail of Norwich city. The right hon. Gentleman is entitled to express his views, but it should be borne in mind that the tail should not wag the dog.

My hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mr. Fraser) made a key point about the democratic base and the case that had recently been put to the electorate, and he ended with a series of questions to the Minister that I shall reiterate.

The hon. Member for Chesterfield (Paul Holmes)—he is an outsider in this debate, as I am—admirably summed up our concerns. He made a key point about Labour's manifesto, saying that it gives the Government a completely open-ended chance to reorganise local government, with no parameters. It effectively gives them the opportunity to do what they want, no matter what the opinion of the majority might be in any particular place—an utterly wretched situation.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Bacon) raised many questions about the way in which the process had been put together. His contribution was not only illuminating but entertaining. I agree with him on the process and about the timetable problems that have already arisen. The reorganisation has not run according to the timetable. Indeed, it is already well off it. The trouble is that it will result in a rushed process that could be dangerous to the processes of democracy.

My hon. Friend was joined in that concern by Sir Michael Lyons in his consideration of the future of local government. In page 11 of his executive summary about local reorganisation, he said:

"The vast experience of reorganisation in this country provides a warning about the risks of poorly developed or executed change, and shows that it is by no means a panacea. I therefore put a much stronger emphasis on the responsibility of authorities to develop effective and flexible coalitions, which transcend boundaries and seek joint solutions to problems where those offer potential advantages."

Most on this side of the Chamber would say that that opportunity ought to remain in the minds of the Minister and of the boundary committee; it is a much better way forward than what seems to have been proposed. My hon. Friend stopped short of declaring the whole thing a shambles, but what is in process might yet turn out to be one.

The hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) asked whether there was any evidence about costs. He spoke of asking the boundary committee, with regard to its evidence-based process, what evidence it had for going forward. He got the honest answer, "Well, it's a bit mixed." He could have gone to others. He could have asked the previous Minister for Local Government, now Minister for the Environment, for his views. I did so when the Public Bill Committee was debating the Local Government and Public Involvement in Health Act 2007. We spoke about the costs of the process of reorganisation, and I asked whether we should be wary, on the basis of our collective experience, of those who wave cost savings at their electors as the potential good news behind restructuring. The Minister answered:

"The answer to that is yes."—[Official Report, Local Government and Public Involvement in Health Bill Committee, 1 February 2007; c. 89.]

If even the Minister cannot see that as a key point to be taken forward, none of us should be under any illusion about the matter. If a reorganisation or restructuring is not being pursued for financial reasons or efficiency, what is it about?

I have two concerns about this reorganisation. The key one is democratic accountability. It is clear that the council submitted its proposal under the formula and the timetable, but that it failed utterly on every ground to convince the Government of its case for it being a unitary authority. The Government's invitation to councils to take part in the process, published in October 2006, gave a clear indicative timetable. It said that by July 2007 a final announcement—no ifs, no buts—would be made of those areas that would be restructuring into unitary authorities. Well, it was not final. Out of the shambles of the application came the invitation to the boundary committee to proceed.

I task the Minister with this question. If all the other councils in Norfolk say that they do not want a change, and if they say that they want to remain with the status quo because it delivers effective and efficient local government in Norfolk, is he seriously prepared to allow the case being made by only one authority to override the views of those who are democratically elected in other parts of the county? I should be grateful if the Minister were to answer that.

My second concern is the invitation to the boundary committee. Most of us are quite surprised, given the width of its remit, that it has taken the job on. On what basis or criteria did the Government decide to invite the boundary committee to do the job? There is no doubt that they have the power, but I have heard no explanation of why, in some cases, it was decided to call a halt to the process and why, in others, it was decided to involve the boundary committee. It seems difficult to avoid a sense of arbitrariness.

I conclude by raising publicly the questions that I asked the Minister in a letter dated 14 November. They adequately sum up the concerns that have been expressed today. My first question was about the remit given to the boundary committee in relation to Norfolk, and whether the Minister would publish it. It is extraordinary that the committee is beginning work with no one else knowing what it has been tasked with. I do not see the point of that.

The second question was what time frame had been set for the review to be conducted, where it was set out and when it would be made public. The third point was that the timetable set out in the original invitation to councils in England had proved valueless for a number of proposed reorganisations. I asked what guarantee the people of Norfolk would have that the current timetable of the boundary committee, should we ever know it, would be adhered to.

The fourth question was about the powers that the boundary committee has to compel local authorities to submit information to it while it is conducting its review. We heard of the sense of menace with which the boundary committee is asking for information. That is a reflection of what has happened to local government. Many Members are concerned about that, and if the Minister can do anything about it in the years to come, it would be appreciated.

There is a sense that local authorities now look upwards to those from the Government and partnership agencies that are running them—and that they are afraid of not doing what they are asked to do—rather than looking outwards to those who elected them. That fundamental change in local government has been emphasised over the past 10 years, and it desperately needs to be cracked into.

My fifth question was whether any options for the structure of local government in Norfolk had been ruled out. We hear about the status quo not being a viable option. Who said so? Where does it say that it cannot be allowed? I have not seen it said in any Government document that two-tier local government is no longer acceptable in Britain. Of course it is. Why is it being ruled out in this case? Who said so? And who told him to say so? Is it possible for the local authorities to argue that the retention of the status quo is the best solution to the structural review?

My sixth question was about who is to pay the costs of the work of the local authorities engaged in the review at the request of the boundary committee and the Government. It is not that the majority of councils in Norfolk accepted the invitation and that the financial costs should therefore be on their own heads. They have been sucked into it, through matters completely outside their choosing.

My seventh question was about what intention there is to consult the public by way of a referendum to seek their views on the existing structure of local government and any proposed changes. The eighth was about whether the change would be implemented without the public being consulted by way of a referendum?

Those questions sum up our concerns. The Minister has a clear sense of them. Having been to a meeting in Dereham last week with a number of councillors from all the Norfolk authorities, I can say that their concerns have been more than properly expressed this morning. The real concern is that people have not asked for the change, they were not consulted about it, and they are unaware of any benefits. They do not know what they are being asked for or why. They do not know why the man who is asking them has the powers to do so, because nothing has been published. If the Minister can help us this morning, we would be much obliged.

The Minister for Local Government (John Healey): I congratulate the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) on securing the debate. It is clearly a matter of great concern and interest to him and his colleagues. I thank him also for his kind words in welcoming me to the debate. I take my duties in the House seriously, although the 300 people that I left at the Queen Elizabeth II conference centre may take a slightly different view.

I recognise the hon. Gentleman's concerns and have discussed many of them with Members representing constituencies in the east of England and with local authority leaders—district and county. The timing of the debate is important because I am working on the terms of reference and the guidance that will be given to the boundary committee to take the next stage of the process further. That is not yet done, so the terms of reference are not sealed. I want to make it very clear, therefore, that the outcome of that process is not a done deal. Nothing is prejudged. I welcome what he expressed as his desire for an honest debate with all options under consideration. I understand and accept that he is in favour of the status quo, but I take those comments to indicate that he is not necessarily against serious consideration of change from the two-tier system.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke) is, and has been for some time, a strong advocate of a unitary authority, as he has shown in this debate. I am pleased that he has welcomed our proposed steps. He is right: opinions are mixed. Opinions within councils and local authorities are mixed, as are those among the public. My hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Chris Mole) reminded me that during the election in May in one of his constituency wards, an anti-unitary candidate polled just 80 votes.

The hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) said that the Government's interest in unitaries is politically driven. Over the past year, we have not looked at any proposals for unitary status and reform and reorganisation unless they were developed and submitted from the areas affected. We received 26 proposals under that process from all political parties. Those were led rightly by politicians in local authorities, but were not party-politically driven.

Norman Lamb: Will the Minister give way?

John Healey: I shall give way once, but if hon. Members will forgive me, I want to deal with the many points that have been made in the small amount of time that has been left to me.

Norman Lamb: Is the Minister concerned that local authorities in Norfolk are expected to come up with their own vision of a unitary Norfolk before the terms of reference have been set? Is that not nonsense?

John Healey: I knew that I should not have given way. If the hon. Gentleman will give me the time, I shall deal precisely with that point. Other hon. Members have made it, including the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk.

The hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Bacon) brings his considerable experience from the Public Accounts Committee to the wider perspective on this debate, and we have debated before many of the issues that he raised. The steps taken over the past 12 months have met precisely the lessons that he draws from his PAC experience. We have studied proposals, some of which were based on benefits. The risks have been considered and there has been, and in some cases continues to be, a very close examination of the costs and financial viability—given my background, I ensured that that happened. The timetable for views and comments is far from being rapid and compressed. In fact, I am being urged by many to ensure that it does not take too much longer. I realise that delaying this process will not make many of these difficult decisions any easier, but I want to ensure that I take into account fully all the information and representations that we have received when coming to final decisions, just as I propose to do with the terms of reference and guidance for the boundary committee.

The hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mr. Fraser) set out three tests: efficiency, better services and decision making closer to the people. That is quite right. Each unitary proposal that we are proceeding with has met those tests, which will continue to be applied to any proposals that might emerge from the process led by the boundary committee. Either I shall cover the questions posed by the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt), or they will be contained in the terms of reference. I have met leaders of local authorities that might be affected and am ready to do so again at appropriate stages of the process.

On the general question of unitary authorities, I would like hon. Members to think back to the relevant White Paper and the invitation to submit proposals. Those were in response to evidence and arguments put to us at the time that, in some two-tier areas, existing arrangements simply did not deliver the governance that we require from our local communities and authorities in this modern day. There can be a duplication of services, confusion and inefficiency between the two tiers—the points outlined by the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb). We were also told that for some areas a move towards a unitary authority could improve accountability, create stronger leadership, and improve efficiency and services to local people. Those have been the objectives throughout the process and the criteria against which we have judged any proposals. That is very far from change for change's sake.

On Norwich in particular, far from failing on every count, as the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire suggested, the Secretary of State judged—I confirm this—that there was a reasonable likelihood of the unitary proposal from Norwich meeting three of the five criteria: strong, effective and accountable strategic leadership; neighbourhood flexibility and empowerment; and support from a broad cross-section of partners and stakeholders. The problems were with value for money and affordability. By looking at the boundaries, we can take a closer look at whether there is a viable unitary option based on Norwich but, perhaps, encompassing a wider city boundary. From meetings that I have had recently, I am quite clear about the interests that will be in the terms of reference and guidance, and I shall reflect on points put to me in this debate and meetings before issuing those terms of reference, which I aim to do in January, so that the boundary committee can formally begin its work on the review.

The boundary committee has begun a preliminary process of contacting local interested parties and authorities to explain the process of the review and to instigate informal discussions to get background and ideas for the future. I deplore the accusations that the boundary committee has acted with menace, harassment or bullying. The plain fact is that if local authorities do not participate, they cannot play a part in and influence the debate.

The boundary committee does not have powers to compel local authorities to submit information. It is a matter for local authorities to decide how to respond. The terms of reference and guidance will set out the boundary committee's remit, which will be made available in the House Library. I will also make them public and send copies to all hon. Members who have participated in this debate and who are affected by the constituencies covered. The time frame will be set out in the terms of reference as well. To be clear, the Local Government and Public Involvement in Health Act 2007 does not require us to conduct referendums, but the process will last a number of months, and there will be plenty of opportunity for local authorities and the public to make their views known throughout.

I shall address a point about which the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk was particularly concerned. When asked for advice, under the terms of the 2007 Act the boundary committee can recommend that the Secretary of State implements the proposal without modification or that she does not implement it—in other words, that the status quo should remain—or it may make an alternative proposal. If it does the latter, it must undertake clear consultation.

In summary, there is no predetermined number of local authorities at the end of the process, which will be open and widely consultative. The way that it will be conducted is set out in statute and there will be plenty of opportunities for hon. Members to play a full and influential part in the House and in their constituencies.

Economic Development (Falkirk)

12.30 pm

Mr. Eric Joyce (Falkirk) (Lab): I want to talk about the economy of Falkirk, because that is my constituency. However, to some degree, it is a false construct, because economies in our constituencies—local, regional, national and global economies—are increasingly interdependent. I shall make two points and ask two questions. I shall ask my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Scotland Office about the enterprise strategy, because it seems to be one of the Government's most important tasks. The Government are consulting on the strategy, and that will result in a White Paper early next year. I shall also raise the issue of the reorganisation of an agency in Scotland. It is primarily a devolved issue, but it still has important implications for many businesses and industries throughout my constituency. Some organisations that I shall mention operate within my constituency, but they may be based in colleagues' constituencies. If I refer to such an organisation, I shall explain that it is in a colleague's constituency, but that it employs my constituents.

I shall start by putting the issue into a localised context for my hon. Friend the Minister. I am absolutely confident that he will want to hear a good deal about Falkirk, so I shall give him some of that action. Employment in Falkirk is at 78 per cent., against the Scottish average of 76 per cent. Historically, Falkirk was an iron town: it supplied the shipbuilding and related industries on the Clyde and in my hon. Friend's constituency. Until the late 1970s, the general assumption locally was that people would continue to be employed in the iron and related industries, and in the tertiary manufacturing industries that went with them. The typical pattern was for a man to start work at a bus factory—Alexander Dennis, for example, which still exists—and work there for his entire life. Frequently, that was the sole family income, and it was the model of employment for a good chunk of my constituency. Ironically, unemployment was higher and employment was lower than today, so when people look back to the golden age of Falkirk's iron and related manufacturing industries, which were far greater then, they look back to a period of higher unemployment and lower mean family incomes. Generally, people were less well off.

Today, my constituency's economy is much more service-based, and based on the fact that it is a 25-minute train ride from Falkirk to Edinburgh or Glasgow. I call the whole area, "Glasburgh", because it is increasingly becoming one large economic entity of its own, rather like a large metropolitan area in England. Glasgow and Edinburgh are growing economies, and my constituency benefits hugely from that. Many commuters travel to service industry jobs in banks in Edinburgh and—to some degree—in public bodies in Glasgow. Many private sector organisations are based in Glasgow, too, but there is a general pattern whereby more people tend to travel to Edinburgh to work in the private sector.

The claimant count in Falkirk has decreased by 2.2 percentage points in the past half-dozen years. Falkirk is more reliant for employment on large enterprises than others, and many of my constituents are employed in the chemical industries. There is a refinery at Grangemouth in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow and East Falkirk (Michael Connarty), and he does a great deal of work with the companies in those industries. In particular, there is a very large company called INEOS, and it is expanding. It has a very successful business story, and the company employs many of my constituents. Unlike Members, they do not often care about travelling across boundaries to do their jobs, so they travel two or three miles out of my constituency and work in the chemical industry.

It is artificial to remove the chemical industry and related industries—the refinery—from the economic footprint of my constituency, or indeed of central Scotland, because if we consider the patterns of employment and the way in which the economy operates, those industries make all the difference to the local economy. If we discount the refinery and the effect of the chemical industries on the Falkirk economy, none the less, there is a varied pattern: a range of industries and companies, large and small, and their future will increasingly shape Falkirk's future.

Falkirk has a programme called, "My Future's in Falkirk", which is a 10-year economic development initiative to transform the area into a diverse and modern economy, and also make it a nice place to stay. Last week, Falkirk acquired a lottery fund living landmarks grant of £25 million, the biggest ever awarded, which will go towards building two, big, nodding kelpies. A kelpie is a big horse, in case there is any doubt. It will be a fabulous landmark, sitting alongside the Falkirk wheel, which was built with funding of £80 million, much of which came from the lottery and from Europe. The wheel is one of Scotland's foremost tourist landmarks. It does some good for the local economy, but these things take time, and the strategy of all local agencies, including the local authority, Falkirk council, Scottish Enterprise and private sector agencies that help develop the economy, will ultimately—one hopes—generate about 3,000 to 4,000 jobs. It had not gone to quite that extent until now.

The "My Future's in Falkirk" initiative has generated a commitment, on paper at least, of £750 million of private-sector investment in the area. That is significantly ahead of its original target, which was to generate £200 million by the end of 2012. By then, 4,250 new jobs are expected. That is quite a specific projection, and I never know how those projections are made, but the significant expectation is that the initiative will generate a large number of jobs, and an additional £50 million a year is expected to be generated for the local economy.

I shall mention a couple of points about my constituency's profile. The economy is significantly affected by Grangemouth's refinery and chemical industry, but it is proving successful at diversification. It has its first strategic community plan, and it has notched up successes of late, with many more in sight—they are at the planning stage. The general idea is to make it clear far and wide that Falkirk is an excellent place to live, and that it has a growing economy. A masterplan has been unveiled for a 60-acre eco-friendly village. Planning is a devolved issue, and I shall not wax rhapsodic about it, but we must recognise that if one has a service economy, and many commuters hoping to travel to Edinburgh and Glasgow, where land values are high and prices are expensive, we must build houses where we can so that people can live in such locations and travel to work. We must strike a balance of course, because we want to encourage industries locally and people not just to live but to work locally.

However, we must recognise the nature of the Scottish economy and its overwhelmingly dominant area, which is the central belt between Edinburgh and Glasgow and either side of it. Therefore, the development of decent homes is very important. It is a devolved issue, but I always reflect on the importance not just of local employment but of commuters and travelling.

However, throughout the area, Falkirk has more people employed in manufacturing than Scotland as a whole. Perhaps I could say a word or two about Alexander's, which is unarguably one of the most important companies in the area. It is a manufacturing company that exports much of its product and employs about 900 people. About three years ago, it virtually went into receivership. All those jobs were saved by a new management team, some of whom had previously worked in the company, in conjunction with what was then a Labour Scottish Executive. They turned what could have been a disaster into an enormous success, and Alexander's continues to employ people right across the skills spectrum. Of course there are some jobs that are towards the lower end of the spectrum, but many of them are highly skilled, which is reflected by the trade unions that represent the workers there. The future for Alexander's is generally very bright indeed.

Borg Grech Photography, which is also based in Falkirk, is a small photographic company that has developed wireless technology to allow a camera and computer to talk to each other. The technology has proved valuable to visitors to the Falkirk wheel, and the company is currently building on its success to reach out across Scotland.

Another important economic issue in my area is the redevelopment of what was formerly the Alcan site. It was a large, world-sized aluminium company site and at one stage many thousands of people were employed there. The site is no longer in operation and it is being redeveloped by the local authority, Scottish Enterprise and other agencies as part of "My Future's in Falkirk". Companies are being encouraged to come in and invest. It is a legendary site because many retired people in my constituency worked there. There are large numbers of former artisans who worked in iron foundries and at Alcan, which was a related industry. They tend to be in their 70s and 80s now, but they talk a great deal about the site, so what happens there is important. I hope that there will be increasing economic activity there, albeit of a different kind.

The Helix development, of which my hon. Friend the Minister will be aware, is at the centre of local discussion, and the £25 million grant is crucial to it. The general principle is that by making the area attractive, we will flag up how Falkirk and the surrounding area is a good place for businesses to be based. That, in large part, will help us to move towards the target of £750 million, although I am always cautious when I refer to such figures as I like to see the colour of the money and know who the companies are and what they are going to do, rather than just see a projection. Although I absolutely welcome the principle of a potential £750 million investment, I am keen to know the detail. I appreciate that it will take time to unfold, but I shall keep my finger on the button.

Another company that I wish to mention is Malcolm Allan, a butcher's. I went to visit it expecting something quite different from what I saw. The butchery trade has changed enormously in the past few years and, rather than being a few butcher's shops, the company now supplies products to every town in Scotland—right across the board, even wee villages have a product from Malcolm Allan. It supplies high-quality, top end of the range pies, meat products and so forth and employs about 100 people. Such companies make all the difference to our local economy.

Lomond Plant is another great company. It has been started up by an entrepreneurial family and is doing incredibly well. The only constraint on its growth is the land around it; in one case, an owner is not keen to sell. That is a pity, as it could grow enormously. It employs several hundred people and hires out plant. People tend to work not on the site but with the plant all over Scotland. It is a great success story, constrained only by the unavailability of land in the area.

There is a Falkirk business panel, made up of local businesses, the local authority and Scottish Enterprise, which was recently joined by a group of entrepreneurs from the United States. I know from speaking to them that they were enormously impressed by the energy, drive and imagination of the business panel, which is making a great difference to our area. Environmentally, it is important to flag up the fact that 88 businesses in the Falkirk area are registered with the Scottish Environment Protection Agency for waste disposal and so forth, and more than 3,000 are registered with Falkirk council.

Having given details on some of the companies in the area, I wish to make the point that local businesses, like those across the United Kingdom, ultimately tie into a much larger economy. Their success and failure will depend on not just their ability to recruit and train locally but much larger factors—the cost of money, the fiscal regime, globalisation across the board and competition from the enormous investments that India and China are making in training, science and technology and the threat or potential benefit of that to our economy.

It is essential that my constituents and businesses in my constituency get a chance to feed into the Government's enterprise strategy. My understanding is that, due to the nature of the Administration in Scotland and devolution, there is a little confusion about what the whole thing means. The temptation for people in Scotland is to think that enterprise is a devolved issue and that anything to do with enterprise strategy is therefore devolved. In this case, many of the issues involved are manifestly reserved, and it is important for the consultation that will lead to the White Paper to be extended to my constituency and right across Scotland. Will the Minister assure me that he will examine the possibility of that happening?

Scottish Enterprise is a devolved body, and I do not intend to comment on its operation, but it acts extremely well in conjunction with many employers in my area, my local authority and other agencies. One can discuss until the cows come home how those organisations are best structured—I do not really have an ultimate view on that—but I understand that they may be restructured, in effect passing certain powers up to the Scottish Executive and certain other powers down to local authorities. In the case of a large local authority such as Glasgow or Edinburgh, I can see how that might make sense, as there are economies of scale and expertise to be made at local authority level. I am lucky enough to have excellent officers and good councillors in my local authority, but there is a danger—I shall put it no stronger—that if certain powers currently held by Scottish Enterprise are devolved to local authority level, local economic decisions may be over-politicised. They really ought to be made for economic reasons, not short-term political reasons.

Within the constraints of devolution, reserved powers and so on, will the Minister say whether he has a view on the reorganisation of Scottish Enterprise and whether he is watching its progress? I am especially impressed by the acting chief executive, Stuart Ogg, and his colleagues in my area, and I know that my colleagues who share the Forth Valley Enterprise area feel the same way. I would be concerned with developments if it looked as though we might overly politicise some local economic decisions that would be best kept at a business and economic level.

The Minister of State, Scotland Office (David Cairns): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship this afternoon, Mr. Chope. I am sure that you have an extensive knowledge of the economic situation in Falkirk, and that it has been added to by the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk (Mr. Joyce). It is of course an entirely legitimate and expected role of Members of Parliament to act as advocates and ambassadors for their constituencies in Westminster and Whitehall, but there are few more active advocates for their constituencies than my hon. Friend. He never misses an opportunity to promote his constituency as a good place to live, work and do business. It is to his credit that this is the second debate that he has managed to secure in a few months on economic development in the town of Falkirk and the wider region of central Scotland, and that he has been tireless in advocating the needs of his constituency in that regard.

My hon. Friend asked specifically about how the UK Government's enterprise strategy will be taken forward in Scotland, about the effect of the changes that the Scottish Executive might make to the enterprise network, and about how those factors interact. He was right to say that it is impossible, in the 21st century, to isolate a nation, let alone a region or town, in terms of economic strategy. These matters are interconnected and that is evidenced by the fact that there are Government Departments in both Westminster and Edinburgh with the word "enterprise" in their titles.

It is not possible to say that enterprise is either reserved or devolved; it is closely interdependent with other factors. Decisions that we take here, as a Government, on the macro-economic framework and the taxation regime, and in relation to European regulations and the wider fiscal framework within which business operates, must have an impact on local economic development in Scotland. It is false and simplistic to say that matters relating to enterprise and economic development in Scotland are devolved. That is not the case and my hon. Friend is right to highlight those factors today. I shall address the two issues that he discussed in a moment.

My hon. Friend was right to locate his comments about how the economy in Falkirk is doing within the wider picture of how the Scottish economy is doing.

Recent Scottish gross domestic product figures confirm that the Scottish economy continues to grow at above-trend rates. Since the beginning of 1999, there have been 20 quarters of greater-than-trend growth, which shows that Scotland, like the UK as a whole, is performing consistently well. In contrast, over the same period, progress in some of the major eurozone countries has been constrained by sluggish growth and high unemployment, the American economy has experienced well-documented difficulties and many economies in south-east Asia have been in crisis. So, at a time of international economic uncertainty and rapidly fluctuating commodity prices, Scotland continues to perform well, and more and more people are finding work in a growing economy. This year, there have been record levels of engagement with the labour market and historically low unemployment. Moreover, there have been record highs in the number of people available to take up employment.

Those things have not happened by accident. The Government have pursued policies that combine active labour market stimulation with flexible labour market policies, which allow employers to create jobs and people to take those jobs, and which make that choice pay by ensuring that people are better off in work than they would be on benefits. Programmes such as the new deal have helped to provide more than 280,000 additional jobs in Scotland compared with 1997. The new jobs being created in Scotland since 1997 are overwhelmingly in the private sector. We do not apologise for creating more nurses, doctors, police and community support officers, but it is a myth about the Scottish economy that the growth and employment is located entirely in the public sector. That is not the case. As my hon. Friend discussed, the companies that are expanding and doing well in his constituency are typical of private sector companies throughout Scotland that have been expanding and taking on more workers. As he pointed out in his opening remarks, the Scottish employment rate is 76.5 per cent.—that is higher than the UK equivalent and has been for the past three years. The proportion of those who are economically active, meanwhile, outperforms the UK figure, and the Scottish unemployment figure is lower.

Those figures would have been inconceivable 10 or 15 years ago, when my hon. Friend and I were growing up in politics and became used to Scotland lagging behind the UK even in a time of high unemployment. Constituencies such as Falkirk and Inverclyde used to be at the back of a long tail of constituencies with dreadful unemployment figures. Unemployment now stands at 5.4 per cent., whereas the figure across the EU is 7.1 per cent. Behind those figures are people and families who can now aspire to better things for their children, enjoy more holidays and look forward to Christmas in a way that simply would not be possible were we still in the high-unemployment economy that existed when unemployment was regarded as a price worth paying.

My hon. Friend mentioned many companies in his constituency and the people who are creating jobs and driving economic growth. He mentioned in particular Malcolm Allan the butchers, which is a great example of a small, local company with an entrepreneurial spirit seeing an opening in the market and moving it forward. I would like to share with him an example from my constituency that highlights what is going on in Scotland beyond Falkirk. Port Glasgow, in my constituency, has a huge new Tesco store, which is very welcome and has created many new jobs but has put pressure on the traditional town centre. What is going to happen to the traditional small shops and businesses that employ small numbers of people and have been the backbone of the local economy for many years? My hon. Friend talked about the local butcher in his constituency making a difference; our active Port Glasgow town centre traders association is headed by the local butcher, Drew Mackenzie, who is an excellent businessman and has real entrepreneurial spirit and a passion for Port Glasgow. He is helping to drive forward an agenda that will see the town centre flourish alongside Tesco; it does not have to wither and die.

Mr. Joyce: The Minister and I clearly have something in common—entrepreneurial and excellent local butchers—and it is good to hear about Drew and Malcolm. I also have a company called Composite Energy, which is looking to extract methane from under the ground. It tells me that there was considerable risk in setting up the venture, which involved people reducing their incomes and making substantial investments, and that it will not pay off for some time. Does the Minister agree that the way in which we tax such businesses is absolutely fundamental to whether they can make a fist of things in the early years?

David Cairns: I agree entirely. We must have taxation and broader fiscal strategies that encourage entrepreneurialism and encourage people to create jobs. Those jobs might not be created in the same volume as those created by massive employers in our constituencies in years gone by, but we are tired of putting all our eggs in too few baskets. We need a diversified employment base in those areas, and given a choice between having one factory employing 1,000 people and 10 factories employing 100, I know which I would choose. We have to ensure that we encourage those small businesses.

In the few minutes remaining, I shall address the two specific points that my hon. Friend raised. He rightly said that the Government are engaged in consultation with business in preparation for a new enterprise strategy paper next year and that much consultation has been taking place throughout the UK. He is also right to call on the Government to ensure that Scottish businesses are consulted, especially in areas that are not devolved, because we cannot simply isolate the conditions for the economic growth of small and medium-sized businesses and say that that area is devolved; it is not. I assure him that the Government will work closely with businesses in Scotland to make sure that they have an input into our enterprise strategy for the years ahead. As the UK develops its policy, it is vital that the voices of Scottish businesses are heard on many of the broader issues of taxation and European regulation that have been mentioned, and on the question of how we rise to the challenges of globalisation.

My hon. Friend mentioned the reform of the enterprise network. I shall not stray too far on to that because it is devolved, but we are all watching it with interest. We know that it is important to get this right. It is important to have a higher-level strategic view across regions—those of us who have been local councillors know about the demands on local council finances—so that we do not lose vital economic stimulation.

[David Cairns]

I congratulate my hon. Friend on bringing these issues to the House's attention. He is an excellent advocate for his constituency and as long as he is a voice representing Falkirk in the House, the needs of business, enterprise and employers in that area will never be short of a close and articulate friend.

Digital Broadcasting (Forest of Dean)

1 pm

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): It is a great pleasure to serve under your chairmanship once again, Mr. Chope. Just to be clear about the scope of this debate, it is primarily focused on digital radio broadcasting services, although I shall touch at the end on digital television and ask the Minister one or two questions about it.

On 19 July, Ofcom announced a licence to provide a multiplex digital local radio broadcasting service in Gloucestershire. Having studied the advertisement and discussed it with colleagues who are more technically knowledgeable than me about such matters, I had several concerns about how well the digital multiplex would serve my constituents.

I wrote to Ofcom's chief executive on 13 September to express my concerns about the tender advertisement. The advertisement implied that there would be a big focus on a transmitter at Churchdown, which would leave my constituents disadvantaged, due to the geography of our county. I also expressed concern that the tenders would inevitably focus on the urban and more densely populated parts of the county, which has Cheltenham and Gloucester at the centre geographically, and that they would tend to leave the more outlying rural areas, including my constituency in the Forest of Dean, somewhat at a disadvantage. I had a response from Ofcom on 5 October which I thought was rather dismissive of the concerns that I had raised on behalf of my constituents. I did not think that it dealt adequately with my concerns.

On 24 October, applications closed for the licence for Gloucestershire. There were two applicants: MuxCo Gloucestershire Ltd and Now Digital. Having taken some time to study their bids, I believe that neither would provide decent or acceptable coverage for my constituents in the Forest of Dean. The bid from MuxCo is much the worse of the two, from my constituents' point of view. Looking at the mapping that has been provided, it seems that the whole western part of my constituency and three of the four towns—Cinderford, Coleford and Lydney—would be almost completely excluded from being able to receive the digital radio signal. My rough estimate is that well over half of my constituents would be excluded from the company's broadcasts.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): Is my hon. Friend and constituency neighbour aware that whereas the MuxCo proposal is disadvantageous to his constituency, it does include most of the Cotswolds, but the proposal from Now Digital, which gives his constituency a little bit of coverage, gives the Cotswolds virtually none? Does he agree that it is unacceptable for Ofcom to put out a tender that does not include the maximum number of people in both our constituencies?

Mr. Harper: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention. Indeed, I was about to discuss the Now Digital proposal. As he may have guessed from my comments on the MuxCo proposal, the Now Digital one is marginally better for my constituents, but, as far as one is able to tell, it still excludes Cinderford and Coleford and a large chunk of the population in the west of my constituency, and, as he said, it almost completely excludes his constituency.

The extraordinary thing about both bids is that they exclude large chunks of Gloucestershire, which is actually the area covered by the broadcasting licence, but they broadcast to significant parts of Wiltshire, south Gloucestershire and Worcestershire. Many people who are not covered by the local radio stations will be able to get the signal, but many of the people who ought to be able to get it will not.

I have written to both companies, first, to try to get more accurate information. The number of people who will or will not be covered under their bids cannot be ascertained from the map—it is not very clear. I am realistic and could understand, given the geography of my constituency, if less than 100 or even 99 per cent. of my constituents were covered. Indeed, under the current analogue broadcasting arrangements, some parts of the constituency that are large geographically but relatively small in population numbers do not get very good coverage. However, a bid that excludes significant parts—three of the four major towns, and approaching more than half of my constituents—is simply not acceptable and cannot really be considered a bid for a Gloucestershire local broadcasting system.

Therefore, I wrote to both organisations and to Ofcom to ask for more information but also to ask them, particularly Ofcom, to take into account my concerns after seeing the bids and to consider whether the situation could be improved. My constituents are very concerned about it. I have had people write to me in the past about digital television broadcasting and the problems that they experience with it, and I know that many of them are concerned about problems with radio broadcasting.

The Government very much promote the move to digital broadcasting across platforms, as do I in general—it has several advantages—but it is important that as many constituents as possible are included in the digital world and that we do not set up a digital divide, with my constituents being on the wrong side of it. I would be very pleased if the Minister would address that concern.

As a result of my securing this debate, Ofcom has been in touch with my office and provided me with a helpful briefing note—at least, it is helpful in respect of the facts; it is not particularly helpful in respect of the process that it will follow. It states that it does not require that any specific areas within the outline boundary—in this case, Gloucestershire—be served, and that it does not have a preference about the transmitters that the companies use, which, of course, does not cheer me at all.

Ofcom also stated that its assessment will consider the population coverage achieved within the county as a whole, but that it is prevented from requiring that all or any part of the area be served. Clearly, that has left me with a great concern that one or either of the bids will be approved unchanged, and that my constituents will be locked out of being able to enjoy local digital broadcasting in the future. That is not acceptable.

I would be grateful if the Minister could explain what guidance her Department gives Ofcom and licensees about balancing the geographic coverage of their broadcasting footprint and the number of people that they reach, and how they balance the different areas. Clearly, they are looking at Gloucestershire as a whole. My view is that even if they were to reach a certain level of population and geographic coverage in Gloucestershire, it would be unacceptable if some parts of the county were wholly or partially excluded, particularly if they contain a large number of people. I would be grateful if the Minister could explain whether there is any way of taking that into account and ensuring that areas are not completely excluded.

I would also be grateful if the Minister would provide information about the number of people in my constituency who would be excluded from receiving digital radio broadcasting under each of the bids, and whether she thinks that it is right, as we move to a digital world, that significant parts of the population are excluded.

Finally, just to finish on the radio piece, are there any plans in the future, as there are with the analogue television signal, to switch off analogue radio signals? Clearly, it would be a serious matter if significant parts of the population were unable to receive them. For many people, particularly those who are isolated or unable to get out, radio and television as a means of communication with the outside world are incredibly important, and it would not be acceptable to cut them off.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way and promise not to intervene on him again. The position is even worse than he has outlined. I understand that the multiplex platforms will serve as platforms for a variety of programmes, so that not only the BBC but commercial radio will be affected. For example, if his constituents were cut off, they would be cut off from Radio Gloucestershire and also from commercial programmes such as Classic FM, so there would be a huge void.

Mr. Harper: My hon. Friend is right. A multiplex broadcasts a range of radio stations, so if someone cannot receive a signal they miss out not just on one station, but on all of them, which is serious.

The issue highlights a number of concerns about digital television in my constituency. Digital or analogue switchover in the Forest of Dean will take place in 2010 or 2011—different parts of my constituency receive signals from different transmitters because of the geography and topology of the area. A number of people receive poor digital television reception at the moment and many have no choice but to use a satellite platform because they cannot receive a digital terrestrial signal. I have pressed the Department about that, but the only answer that I have been able to get is that when digital switchover takes place the "vast majority of people in the Forest of Dean will be able to get a signal".

"Vast majority" can mean many things to many people, and given the big gaps on the radio broadcasting map it would be helpful if the Minister would clarify what "vast majority" means. Clearly, it will be not be acceptable if significant parts of my constituency cannot receive an adequate digital television signal after switchover. The Government have made plans to ensure that most people in the country can receive a digital television signal, and I had been content with previous answers until I looked at digital radio coverage and saw how patchy it was. That has elevated my level of concern about television coverage. The Minister knows that the television switchover from analogue to digital worries people throughout the country.

In the Forest of Dean, digital TV coverage is patchy, and digital radio coverage on the local multiplex is proposed to be "very poor" in one bid and "poor" in the other bid. Mobile phone coverage is also patchy in my constituency. My constituents have a right to be included in the digital future, and not to be trapped on the wrong side of a digital divide. That is the nub of the issue, and I shall be grateful if the Minister will turn her attention to it.

The Minister of State, Department for Culture, Media and Sport (Margaret Hodge): I congratulate the hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper) on securing this debate, and giving the Chamber the benefit of the attention that he has given to digital broadcasting and television in his constituency. I will deal with the specific issues that he raised, but it is important to look at the context, particularly the rapid transition to digital broadcasting that is under way.

This is an exciting time in our transition to digital broadcasting. As he and other hon. Members know, switchover began in Whitehaven at 2 o'clock in the morning last Wednesday. The analogue television signal was switched off and replaced with digital signals. That means that everyone there now has a choice of how to receive digital services. For the first time, all Whitehaven residents can receive digital television terrestrially via an aerial. That gives viewers in the area access to the wider choice of channels that is a feature of digital TV. Everyone can now receive the BBC's digital channels, which they have been paying for through their licence fee but, until now, could not receive via an aerial. I will return to the hon. Gentleman's point, but Whitehaven and his constituency are probably not dissimilar. It is not possible to deliver digital terrestrial TV without switching off the analogue signal.

Early evidence from Whitehaven shows that the switchover went well. There are bound to be a few hitches and glitches along the way but, on the whole, people have been able to use the equipment, and the process seems to have gone smoothly. Most people seem to be genuinely pleased with the increased choice of channels now open to them, and are getting used to using the new equipment. I hope that the hon. Gentleman takes some comfort from that for when the analogue signal in his area is switched off and a digital is introduced. The hon. Member knows that switchover for most of his constituents, who receive their signal from ITV West, will start in 2010.

The hon. Gentleman may be interested to know that Digital UK and Ofcom track awareness of switchover, and awareness in the ITV West region is better than the national average at 91 per cent., which is 8 per cent. above the national average; 85 per cent. of households have already converted their primary TV, but not all their sets, to receive digital signals, which is also well above the national average. That suggests that his constituents are well prepared for switchover.

It would be worth while for the hon. Gentleman to remind his constituents why digital is better. First, it can be received by more homes. At present, only around 75 per cent. of homes receive the digital terrestrial signal, and only by switching off the analogue signal can digital terrestrial coverage be increased. We want to increase it to 98.5 per cent. Unless my officials give it to me, I do not have the figure for the hon. Gentleman's constituency. They have passed me a note stating what I knew—around 98.5 per cent. of his constituents should have access. I will write to Digital UK and Ofcom on the hon. Gentleman's behalf to find out whether they have more accurate figures for coverage. Given the dispersal of the population in his constituency, his constituents are clearly more vulnerable, and I accept the proposition that underpins what he is saying.

Access to digital TV provides better sound and picture quality. Many people can access digital TV by other means, such as satellite, cable or broadband, but many others will wish to continue receiving TV through their aerial after switchover. One reason for switchover is to release spectrum for new and different uses, and Ofcom is consulting on that. There is a range of exciting possibilities, including high-definition TV, mobile TV, and wireless broadband, and new services are emerging daily in this fast-changing communications environment. We hope that Ofcom will shortly publish the conclusions of its consultations on how to allocate that spectrum.

The main content of the hon. Gentleman's contribution was on digital radio. The switch to digital TV provides new opportunities for people to receive digital radio services, because all the main digital TV platforms also carry a range of digital radio channels. There are some 26 digital radio stations on Freeview, and satellite and cable services offer even more.

Interestingly, radio is one area where convergence can be seen in action. It has been possible for some time to listen to digital radio not only via digital TV and digital audio broadcasting but over the internet, which offers thousands of stations that can be received through portable wi-fi radios without the need for a DAB radio to access the services. We reckon that around 15 per cent. of total radio listening is across digital platforms, so the hon. Gentleman should remember that DAB is only one way in which his constituents can access digital radio.

Mr. Harper: The Minister is right in saying that a wide range of radio stations is available on digital television and the internet. Local radio stations are available on the internet, and some constituents use that, but clearly not everyone will want or be able to do so. Will local radio stations—for example, Radio Gloucestershire and Severn Sound—be available on the digital television platform, or will it provide only national stations? That is important.

Margaret Hodge: I am being told from behind that it will probably just be the national stations, but I should have thought that those other stations will be available on the net. That might be one of the solutions that is particularly appropriate to the hon. Gentleman's constituency, given the dispersed nature of its population.

I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman has done this yet, but I was going to suggest that he engage in discussions with others in addition to the broadcasters, given the commercial way in which licences are settled. Discussions with the regional development agency and others might yield a new way of supporting funding and access to the new communication platforms. The regional development agencies certainly played a key role in rolling out broadband in areas where it was uneconomic to do so on a commercial basis, although I do not know whether that is relevant to the hon. Gentleman's constituency. If he engages in such discussions, they may well be fruitful, and he may want to come back to me after he has had an opportunity to discuss the issue.

To date, about 5.5 million DAB sets have been sold in the UK, but we should remember that there are 100 million analogue sets. DAB sets are therefore still quite a small part of the total market, but we expect them to be one of the things that people spend their money on when buying presents over the Christmas period. In addition, one in five adults now lives in a DAB household, and we expect that figure to double to 40 per cent. by the end of 2009. We therefore expect quite rapid growth.

Recently, the second national DAB multiplex was awarded to the 4Group, which is led by Channel 4, and we hope that that will lead to the delivery of an even greater range of services. Although we are seeing such growth, I must acknowledge that the coverage of national DAB signals is a barrier to growth, as both hon. Gentlemen have experienced. Broadcasters and Ofcom have recognised that and are working to improve coverage. The BBC has already committed itself to extending the coverage of its national DAB stations to 90 per cent. during the current charter, and I hope that the hon. Member for Forest of Dean welcomes that. The commercial national stations—on the Digital One multiplex—already achieve nearly 90 per cent. national coverage. That means that those who are covered listen to stations such as Classic FM, which the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) mentioned.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: It is all very well the Minister quoting national figures, which say that 90 per cent. of people have coverage, but under one of the proposals, 90 per cent. of my constituents will not have coverage. Does the Minister not agree that the tendering process for the two bids is very unsatisfactory when there is such inequality of coverage in a county such as Gloucestershire?

Margaret Hodge: I would agree if the decision had gone one way or the other, but we do not yet know what decision Ofcom will reach on the two applications. I cannot prejudge the view that it will take, but we do know that coverage matters, although I should make it clear—this will probably not be of enormous comfort to the two hon. Gentlemen—that coverage means population coverage. Population coverage is the key, not geographic coverage. I completely understand that that creates difficulties for those who live in particularly isolated areas, but it is population that we want to reach with these new licences—the 13 extra licences for local digital radio that Ofcom is in the process of offering in the market and which the hon. Gentlemen are concerned about.

I hope that both hon. Gentlemen welcome the fact that Ofcom is also involved in the "Future of Radio" consultation, which is looking at whether Ofcom should have greater powers to increase the licensed areas of local multiplexes and enable local stations to increase their coverage. That consultation has just taken place, and Ofcom is due to publish its conclusions shortly. The Government will be considering its recommendations on this and other issues, and I am sure that both hon. Gentlemen will want to let us have their views on Ofcom's document when it emerges.

The hon. Gentlemen are clearly primarily concerned about the licence for the Gloucester multiplex. Those were advertised in July, and a decision is expected in January 2008, but it is clearly inappropriate for me to comment on any decisions. As I have told the hon. Gentlemen, Ofcom is bound to put a greater emphasis on population than on geography.

Mr. Harper: The Minister has been very clear about that, as has Ofcom, but one of the things that I asked her was whether she thinks that that is appropriate. It is appropriate for a national broadcasting system and national data, but is it appropriate for a local radio station completely to exclude big chunks of whole counties? Might the Minister's Department not wish to look at that when it discusses with Ofcom the framework that it uses to allocate licences?

Margaret Hodge: Let us look at what comes out of Ofcom's review. At the end of the day, however, licences are allocated on commercial grounds, and it is for those making submissions for licences to decide how many separate stations they will have to give them the coverage that they need. If we believe that the issue is best driven by the market, it is extremely difficult for us to lay down criteria, which would intervene very negatively in the market and probably prevent the development of the sort of local radio stations that we are looking to have throughout the country. We therefore have a tension between public benefit and commercial viability, which is why I suggested that one way for the hon. Member for Forest of Dean to take the debate forward following the allocation of the licences might be to enter into discussions with the regional and local authorities to see whether they feel that they have any role to play where there has been a market failure of the kind that he alleges has occurred in the allocations. We must wait and see what happens following the allocations.

In correspondence with Ofcom, the hon. Gentleman asked why its advertisement gave Churchdown hill as an example of a transmitter that those applying for a licence might want to use. There is no determination on the part of Ofcom to ensure that that is the transmitter that is used by whoever is awarded the licence—it is simply given as an example. Again, there are clearly huge technical challenges, given the terrain of the Forest of Dean, and both of those who have applied for the licence will no doubt have put their minds to the issue. It is in their interests to increase the audience, but they must do so in a way that remains commercially viable for them.

The other issue to which Ofcom will have regard—I hope that the hon. Gentleman approves of this—is how fast the applicants will roll out transmission of the service across the area. As he will know—I am sure that Ofcom will have told him this—there is a series of other criteria to which it will have regard, and I can write to him about those if he does not have them.

[Margaret Hodge]

The Government have no plans to set a timetable for radio switchover. The issues for consumers and the industries are far less clear-cut than they were for TV. As I said, digital coverage so far is much lower, but we are considering calls to set up a working group to consider the future of digital radio in the UK. One issue that any such group would need to consider is how to ensure that as many people as possible can have access to the great range of services offered by digital radio.

In conclusion, digital broadcasting can bring benefits for consumers, including better quality and better choice, but Ofcom must work with industries to consider the barriers to the growth of such services.

Housing (West Ham)

1.30 pm

Lyn Brown (West Ham) (Lab): Before I outline some of the difficulties faced by my constituents because of pressure on the housing market in Newham, I want to welcome the commitment in the Queen's Speech to a housing and regeneration Bill, and in particular to increasing the amount of new social housing to be built. The key challenge will be to ensure that homes that have already been promised are provided.

I want to focus on housing pressures in my constituency which need to be addressed if the Government's aim of ensuring that everyone has access to a decent, affordable home is to be realised. My first concern is that the new homes built in my constituency should be suitable for the people who most need them. To put it simply, we must build homes for those who are in the most need—those who are already on the housing list for affordable, acceptable accommodation. I speak particularly of the 5,000 people in Newham who are housed in temporary accommodation for years on end, shunted from property to property because their salary does not allow them to get their foot on the first rung of the housing ladder.

Let us not misunderstand what that means to those families. They are often shunted from home to home as their leases finish. They do not have the stability that comes with a permanent home. They do not manage to put down roots; they cannot sign on doctors' lists; they cannot participate in local leisure clubs; they cannot participate in the community in which they live. Children must often move schools, or travel long distances for their education, which makes it difficult for them to fulfil their potential. That situation obviously does not make for a good community, but neither does it make for an equal society. Moving home is also an expensive business, and the cost affects the very poorest people in society.

There is currently a waiting list of 30,000 for Newham. We must build enough homes to ensure that each of those 30,000 households can find an appropriately sized home at a price they can afford. The waiting list for a two-bedroomed property in Newham is about eight years, rising to 10 years for a three-bedroomed property and 13 years for a four-bed. That is the waiting list for a property—not a house. I hope that the Minister will accept that those waiting times are far too long. It is larger family homes that are most urgently needed in the borough, but those are the least likely to be built.

In a prime example earlier this year of the pressure on housing in Newham, a three-bedroomed council property in Plaistow was named by Roof magazine as the UK's most desirable property, not because of any palatial views or extensive landscaped gardens, but because Newham council received 1,035 applications for the property from would-be tenants. Why? Although the property is well maintained, I am sure that the £81 per week rent, which is a third of what one would expect to pay in the private sector, would make it very desirable indeed for the tenant who secured it. On average the council receives more than 330 applications for each property that it advertises. What practical measures are the Government taking to ensure that new homes are an appropriate size for those on the waiting list? Living in temporary accommodation is not acceptable and does not make for effective or sustainable communities.

A second pressure that should be considered when appropriate housing build for my community is being determined is the dreadful overcrowding that families endure. Size does indeed matter. During the summer of 2006, only 6 per cent. of the homes being developed in the borough had three bedrooms, whereas 65 per cent. had two bedrooms. Smaller properties are a safer and more attractive opportunity for investors, but as young single people become couples, and lucky couples become families, the need for bigger properties grows. Those bigger properties are not available. Newham has the highest average household size in the country. According to the 2001 census it has the greatest number of households in the UK with five or more residents—20 per cent.

The lack of bigger homes is a principal cause of overcrowding, which is a huge problem in Newham, where entire families often live in one-bedroomed flats. The negative impact of overcrowding on family, education, health and community cohesion have been ably demonstrated by organisations such as Shelter, but, sadly, those impacts are all too frequent in my borough. The 2001 census showed that more than a quarter of Newham's households are overcrowded, lacking at least one room for the number and type of people in the household. It is a London-wide consideration, and the draft London housing strategy proposes that 42 per cent. of social rented homes entering the programme should have three or more bedrooms.

Research by the Housing Corporation in 2006 indicates that about 82 per cent. of people aspire to own their own home. Nationally those aspirations are gradually being realised, with 70 per cent. of homes owner-occupied, but in Newham less than 50 per cent. of houses are owner-occupied. I hope that our aspirations to assist people to realise their home-ownership aspirations will be taken seriously.

That brings me neatly to the issue of the right to buy—its regulation and its impact on West Ham. I should certainly welcome measures to cool the overheated buy-to-let market, which has helped both to ratchet up the cost of temporary accommodation for local authorities, at an extreme cost to the Exchequer, and to decrease the affordability of housing for ordinary working families, above all in the capital. Housing benefit spend in my borough is £245 million. A third of that—£67 million—is spent paying private landlords. The average amount of housing benefit paid to council tenants in Newham is £70 a week. The average housing benefit payment for temporary accommodation is £350 a week—five times that paid to council tenants. It does not take a genius to recognise that funding additional social housing provision in my borough could prove beneficial to the Exchequer, not to mention to those families who cannot afford to work and keep a roof over their heads.

Official Newham statistics state that of the 950 new homes completed in 2005-06, only 132 were for the social rented sector. I have no doubt that the bulk of that new private accommodation will be buy to let: 45 per cent. of the market homes in London are bought to let, and the proportion is greater in areas where property is cheaper. In comparison with many parts of London, Newham is cheap. I recognise the importance of the private rented sector for those who cannot yet afford to buy their own home, and for those who are seeking more temporary accommodation, but rents are climbing as rapidly as house prices. We do not want to return to the Rachman era in London, with people being forced to pay exorbitant rents because they have no other choice.

I want to touch on regulation. The Housing Act 2004 introduced a welcome mandatory licensing scheme for larger houses in multiple occupation. It placed the onus on the landlord to register the property with the council, or face a fine. That means that environmental health officers have a much better chance of finding the properties that are more likely to endanger the health and safety of the occupants, and of improving the immediate physical conditions and management standards. I do not want the Minister to get me wrong: some landlords understand their responsibilities both to their tenants and to the wider community. However, a small number exploit their tenants, graze on housing benefit subsidies and ignore the impact of antisocial behaviour on neighbouring residents. I have lost count of the number of complaints that I have received from my constituents about absentee landlords.

There are two principal problems with the current regulations in my constituency. First, the mandatory licensing scheme only covers homes with three or more storeys. The borough contains the largest building site in Europe—if it is not, it feels that way—and some of the population is made up of migrant workers who often live in small homes, many to a room. The homes are too small to accommodate the number of people living in them, and many facets of living, some with significant links to health problems, overflow into the street and garden.

Secondly, the exceptionally high levels of occupancy are causing stress in local communities, and the local council does not have the power to do anything about it. Residents have told me that they will most likely sell and move if the situation does not improve, and their homes are more likely than not to be bought and let, thus exacerbating an already difficult situation. I have discussed the matter, albeit briefly, with the mayor of the borough, and I understand that he would not welcome additional powers unless they were accompanied by severe penalties. The financial reward for cramming houses with large numbers of people is so great that paltry fines do nothing to deter such behaviour; rather, they reinforce the contempt in which some hold the law and those who enforce it.

Little is done to protect those in smaller houses of multiple occupation. Some 80 per cent. of such homes are not covered by the mandatory licensing regime, and the vast majority in my constituency fall outside the mandatory threshold. Newham's environmental health officers must play detective to check that standards are being met, which wastes precious time and resources. If they finally get a landlord to court, he or she would face only a risible fine. I hope that the Minister will consider extending the threshold to all houses of five or more occupants and ensure that the penalties are sufficiently severe and easy to enforce to deter those bent on breaking the law for the easy-to-obtain and high financial benefits.

I am also concerned about the density at which new homes will be built—higher density properties where viable are encouraged by the new proposals. Density of new properties has increased by almost 60 per cent. in this country. In 1997, there were an average of 25 dwellings per hectare; in 2005, there were 42 dwellings per hectare. I appreciate that higher density housing will mean that less land is needed for the proposed

[Lyn Brown]

3 million new homes, and that that will help to protect what little remains of Newham's green and pleasant land, but I cannot advocate a return to the tower block estates of the 1960s and 1970s, which so drastically altered the physical landscape of our towns and cities, produced innumerable social problems, and destroyed communities.

Newham has had many high-density housing developments and by the 1980s had one of the highest concentrations of tower blocks in Britain. The developments failed as communities and the resulting social problems cost the borough and the country huge amounts to put right. The blockbusters programmes of the 1980s attempted to get rid of blocks throughout the country, so why would we want to build more of something that we have recently disposed of? Why would we knowingly recreate the same problems? Public confidence in high-rise tower-block living has been severely eroded, and therefore new blocks are unlikely to include mixed communities. I urge the Minister to look again at the issue and to ensure that we do not create isolated tower blocks of social housing that are destined for failure and disposal.

I am concerned about density. I listen incredulously to nimby debates in the House in which representatives of Her Majesty's Opposition speak against any housing development in their area. They demonstrate little appreciation of others' living conditions, particularly people in the capital. Newham is already densely populated and will undoubtedly become more so as we approach 2012. I am told that we will build a city the size of Portsmouth within my constituency by 2020, but even now, even in the backstreets, it is impossible not to notice the constant bustle and the number of people walking by.

The 2001 census, which is disputed locally as it tended to under-count the population, showed the population density of London to be 45.6 people per hectare. My borough, Newham, was shown to have 67.3 people per hectare, almost one and a half times the average population density of London. The 2006 estimate for the population density of Newham was yet higher at 72.4 persons per hectare. At 45.6 persons per hectare, London is the third most crowded of the major European cities after Paris and Barcelona. Some 15 per cent. of the UK's population lives in London, but it covers less than 0.5 per cent. of England's land mass, which has an obvious effect on the quality of life.

In conclusion, I wish to put on the record issues about which I have spoken in the House before. There are clear interrelationships between housing and poverty in my borough. The exceptional cost of housing and the problems caused by a lack of public sector housing are compounded by the impact of the benefits system. I have spoken previously of evidence from my constituents that housing benefit and the way in which it combines with other sources of income, benefits and tax creates a poverty trap for those in low-paid work. Overcrowding and unsuitable housing contributes to the stark health inequalities that people in my area face as compared with their peers in Westminster, Kensington or Chelsea. The interrelation between high housing costs and other types of deprivation is clear to me, as I hope it is to the Minister, and I believe that a strategic approach to combating the problems engendered by housing affordability and supply is imperative.

I have outlined a whole agenda of issues that I have brought to the Minister directly from the community I serve. The issues arise from a challenging reality, and are urgent and immediate to my constituents and those of many other hon. Members who serve areas in which there is high stress on housing. Will the Minister recognise that we must find real and lasting solutions to these problems? Not to do so would undermine much of what the Government are trying to achieve in the creation of a fair and equal Britain.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government (Mr. Iain Wright): May I begin by saying what a pleasure it is to be serving under your chairmanship, Mr. Chope, for what I believe is the first time? I am pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for West Ham (Lyn Brown) has secured this debate on the important issue of housing demand in her constituency. I wish to pay tribute to her work campaigning on behalf of her constituents, particularly on housing-related topics such as overcrowding and homelessness, which I shall mention later.

My hon. Friend articulated well the serious pressures on housing in her constituency. She recognises, however, that the issue does not arise only in West Ham or London as a whole. Every region in the country now faces affordability pressures, which is why the Prime Minister has made housing a key priority for the country and the Government. Much is being done but, as my hon. Friend pointed out, there remains an awful lot to do. There is a great deal to cover in the time available, and the matter must be set in context. If I do not cover all my hon. Friend's points, I should hope that she would allow me to write to her in future.

It is clear that Newham has high levels of housing demand, as my hon. Friend stated. The number of households on the local authority register of housing increased by slightly more than 4,200 between March 2005 and March 2006, and the latest figures show that there are 5,988 homeless households living in temporary accommodation in the borough. That is one tenth of the total of households in temporary accommodation, a proportion that is, frankly, too high for one single London borough. It is imperative that we work on securing both adequate and affordable housing options in the area. Additionally, the census shows that overcrowding is an issue—more than a quarter of households were deemed overcrowded in 2001.

Although affordability is a problem nationally as well as in London, it is further compounded in Newham where average weekly earnings were assessed at £383, compared with a London average of £450 per week, and average house prices stand at £237,065. There are also relatively low levels of employment, with just over 48 per cent. of working-age adults in employment compared with an England and Wales average of 60 per cent. The number of single-person households is also relatively higher in Newham—it stands at 34 per cent. compared with an England and Wales average of 30 per cent. The borough has the highest proportion of lone-parent households with dependent children in London. All those factors fuel the demand for housing.

So, why do I mention those facts? As my hon. Friend so eloquently made clear, there is a direct link between housing, prosperity, aspiration and opportunity. If people have poor housing, they will have poor life chances. We need to intervene to deal with that. The combination of high levels of social rented tenancies and low employment levels means that accessibility and affordability are vital to get the right sort of housing for my hon. Friend's local community.

My hon. Friend asked what measures the Government are taking to ensure that new homes of an appropriate size are being built. Planning policy statement 3 sets out how the planning system will deliver. Local planning authorities will have to identify enough land to deliver the homes needed in their area over the next 15 years. We have published new guidance that shows how councils can find the land they need. In cases where councils have not identified enough land and do not grant sufficient planning permissions, planning inspectors will be more likely to overturn their decisions and give housing applications the go-ahead.

We regard it as essential that local authorities maximise the supply of building land in their areas, and so we announced in the housing Green Paper published in July our intention to establish a new housing and planning delivery grant to reward local authorities for the delivery of new housing. We will make £510 million available for that grant in the comprehensive spending review. Last month, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Housing launched a consultation on how the new grant should work to provide incentives for those who are doing their bit to deliver the extra housing needed, including bringing more empty homes back into use.

Overcrowding and the supply of family homes were central to my hon. Friend's speech, so I want to expand on those issues. First, however, I want to set the strategic context in London. We believe that the challenge posed by London's housing needs will best be met if we give the Mayor a strong strategic role. That is why the Greater London Authority Act 2007 gave the Mayor the responsibility for producing a statutory housing strategy and for advising Ministers on the allocation of housing investment through the regional housing pot in London. In September, the Mayor launched his draft housing strategy, which will go through a period of consultation before it is finalised next year.

Last month, we announced the proposed regional allocations of housing investment, which will offer London an unprecedented £3.97 billion in 2008-11. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Housing is considering the Mayor's recommendations for how that funding should be allocated between affordable housing, local authority decent homes, private sector decent homes and regeneration. All that additional funding will allow us to provide more social housing, which, as my hon. Friend said, is sorely needed in London to reduce the use of temporary accommodation and to alleviate overcrowding in the capital. The Housing Corporation's recent bidding round reflects the proposals to improve the housing choices for Londoners in the Mayor's strategic housing investment plan, which is part of the draft strategy.

In the meantime, we will invest £1.5 billion in the London affordable housing programme for 2006-08. Through the AHP, we have provided 6,350 social rented homes and 5,370 low-cost home ownership homes in London in 2006-07. We aim to provide 8,000 social rented and 7,870 low-cost home ownership homes in 2007-08.

Newham is central to that growth. Crossrail, the Olympics and Paralympics and the need for a legacy from those games, Stratford city and the Thames Gateway all offer an unprecedented period of opportunity for the borough and its residents. Across the borough and, specifically, in the 2012 unit at Newham, agencies and organisations are working hard to ensure that they achieve a lasting legacy from their role as one of the key host boroughs for the Olympics. That legacy will include the provision of new affordable housing and the creation of jobs for local residents. I hope that my hon. Friend will find it positive that some £38 million of London's affordable housing programme for 2006-08 has been allocated to Newham to deliver around 500 affordable homes.

We are also looking forward to massive regeneration at Canning Town and Custom House. That project forms part of my Department's mixed community initiative, and includes the building of 8,000 new homes and the creation of 500,000 sq m of floor space in a revitalised town centre. The aim of the £2.5 billion project is the physical, social and economic transformation of a highly accessible location in London, creating a sustainable and cohesive community.

There will also be investment in the retail areas, new or improved schools, health, leisure and other community facilities. That will reap dividends for the communities living there and in the surrounding areas. External support for the project is also strong. English Partnerships, the London Development Agency and the Greater London authority, together with a consortium of housing developers and registered social landlords, have all registered their commitment to realising the vision of Canning Town and Custom House regeneration.

I turn now to the new deal for communities in my hon. Friend's constituency, which began with a bang on the Brooks estate—quite literally—when Watts Point crashed down under a controlled explosion in May 2003. Now, 200 new homes are being built by the community housing group and extensive internal and external refurbishments have been carried out on many of the Newham properties. Although work is expected to continue until 2010, the Brooks estate already looks greatly improved.

My hon. Friend mentioned the plight of those in her constituency who live with overcrowding. The Government are aware of that. It is a particular problem in her borough but there are also serious issues of overcrowding in other London boroughs. We are taking action to reduce overcrowding in areas such as my hon. Friend's constituency by seeking to increase the supply of housing in general and, in particular, to increase the supply of family-sized homes.

Through the Housing Corporation's 2006-08 affordable housing programme in London we have increased the proportion of new social homes with three or more bedrooms from 27 per cent. to 34 per cent. Through the London housing pot for 2006-08 we are also funding £20 million of works to extend or remodel social rented homes to provide family homes with four or even more bedrooms.

Following recommendations from the Mayor, which have been accepted by the Government, we shall look to increase further the proportion of homes in the Housing

[Mr. Iain Wright]

Corporation's 2008-11 programme with three or more bedrooms to 42 per cent. We also want to help families to take a first step on the housing level, so we will move incrementally towards a target that will require 16 per cent. of all intermediate homes funded by the Housing Corporation—and by the home and communities agency once the Housing and Regeneration Bill receives Royal Assent—to have three bedrooms or more by 2010-11. We will also fund five sub-regional co-ordinators in London between 2006 and 2008 to work with boroughs to tackle overcrowding.

My hon. Friend mentioned with great eloquence her concern about the density at which new homes are to be built and that we should not return to the tower block estates of the 1960s and 1970s. Government policy on the density of housing is set out in PPS3. Density is a measure of the number of dwellings that can be accommodated on a site or in an area. If done well, the imaginative design and layout of new developments can lead to a more efficient use of land without compromising the quality of the local environment. The highest density of housing in London is found in Kensington and Chelsea. We need to stress the importance of good design and good quality to ensure that people have the homes that they deserve.

The Mayor's London plan provides a matrix for residential densities. In the West Ham area, that will vary from at least 200 habitable rooms per hectare in less accessible locations up to 700 habitable rooms per hectare and more in very accessible locations, such as near town centres and major transport interchanges. The borough is already generally building to those density standards

The Government are committed to achieve a step change in the supply of housing throughout the country. We are putting in place the framework and the funding to achieve our ambitions. However, it is not just about what Government can do. It must be a shared endeavour, with private, public and third sector delivery parties all playing full roles. We must involve local communities, too. In short, everyone needs to play their part. Working together, we can make a real difference. With my hon. Friend leading her community in West Ham, I am sure that we will see the housing pressures relieved.

Question put and agreed to.

[MR. PETER ATKINSON in the Chair]

Horse Racing

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Steve McCabe.]

9.30 am

Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon) (Con): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Atkinson. I am most grateful to have secured the debate, but I shall limit my comments, because I know that a number of right hon. and hon. Members feel very strongly about certain aspects of today's racing scene and I want to give them, if possible, an opportunity to speak.

It is unfortunate, but in a way apposite, that the House is discussing this issue today—the day of the funeral of Sir Tristram Ricketts. Sir Tristram, who devoted his working life to the racing industry, was chief executive of the Horserace Betting Levy Board and a previous chief executive of the British Horseracing Board. Nobody, or few people, contributed more to our industry or worked harder on behalf of British racing. I know that some hon. Members have been unable to attend the debate because they will, quite rightly, be attending his funeral this afternoon.

I share hon. Members' enthusiasm for this, first and foremost, great sport. However, racing is not just a sport but a thriving industry, encompassing bloodstock, race course businesses and, of course, betting. British horse racing is the envy of the world, but the whole industry needs to come together, perhaps as never before, if racing is to flourish. The overall news is positive. For the first time in 80 years, a new race course will open at Great Leighs. According to the British Horseracing Authority, the industry now employs 88,000 people. In 2007, there have been 9,000 races—it seems at times as though there are almost as many bodies representing different parts of racing as there are races. A total of £10 billion is bet annually at off-course bookmakers.

The following is not a party political point; I hope that the Minister will agree. I shall come to the party political points shortly, so I hope that he will not be too disappointed. What racing does not need is the dead hand of Government, but regrettably this Government's procrastination and successive blunders mean that the Government are now more involved in racing than ever.

I am a Member of Parliament for a rural constituency—albeit sadly one without a race course, although Exeter and Newton Abbot are temptingly close across the estuary—where racing and associated businesses provide valuable local employment as well as much-loved recreation in the south-west. It is worth remembering that half the 59 race courses in this country are in rural areas and play at times a perhaps disproportionate role in the local economy.

With your permission, Mr. Atkinson, I shall debate two main issues this morning: the Tote and the future of the levy.

Anne Moffat (East Lothian) (Lab): I just want to make a point before the hon. Gentleman moves off the issue of the local economy. He may be aware that Musselburgh race course is in my constituency, and it is a small and classy course. It creates employment and is great for the local economy in terms of tourism and the like. Does he agree that any reduction in the levy would destroy my local race course and British racing?

Mr. Swire: The hon. Lady has quite properly secured her press release for today. If she will bear with me and allow me to develop my thoughts on the levy, I think that I will answer her and she will not be disappointed.

Pitch positions—a very important issue—were covered comprehensively in recent Westminster Hall debates, two of which were instigated by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith), whom I am pleased to see with us this morning, and one by the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Devine), who is also present. The issue is now the subject of a hearing of the Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport, so I will not rehearse the arguments this morning. However, I would like to ask a couple of questions relating to pitch positions.

Does the Minister now admit that before the Gambling Act 2005, list positions were guaranteed by certificates of approval as issued by the levy board? Does he agree that that Act enabled the Racecourse Association to make its announcement on 14 March this year to refuse to recognise on-course bookmakers' list positions? Was that an intentional consequence of the legislation?

The Government's nationalisation of the Tote was profoundly wrong, and what has happened since has been nothing short of a farce. The Government at the time—it is good to see the previous Minister for Sport, the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn), present as well—gave cast-iron assurances that racing would not lose out from the sale. Initially, Ministers promised that the Tote would be sold only to the Racing Trust for £50 million, but later they gave a pledge that, in the event of its being sold to another buyer, racing would receive half the proceeds from the sale. However, either by conspiracy or cock-up, it transpired that such a move would contravene EU state aid rules. I now understand that PricewaterhouseCoopers, which is advising the Government, has reviewed racing's latest offer of £320 million for the Tote and advised that it risked again being blocked by Brussels. Is that the case? If so, what contingency plan does the Minister have in case the Tote is again not sold? How will the Government honour their manifesto commitment to benefit racing? What compromises have they tried to broker? The Government must now decide the future of the Tote, and an indication from the Minister this morning, setting out once and for all the endgame and a timetable, would benefit all.

When licensed betting operators were legalised in 1961, it was with the proviso that a mechanism should exist to recycle some of the proceeds to racing. The levy, it should be remembered, had two criteria: to meet racing's needs and to take into account the bookmaking industry's ability to pay. As hon. Members are aware, the European Court of Justice ruling on data rights in 2004 prevented an alternative revenue stream for racing from the sale of pre-race data to bookmakers, which might have offered a credible alternative to the levy.

The Government then commissioned Lord Donoughue's future funding of racing review group, which concluded in 2005 that a commercial alternative to the levy would require the Government's intervention to ensure that any sale of picture and pre-race data rights did not fall foul of competition law. Many of us believe that the levy, in its current form, is not the most desirable or even a desirable way of funding racing, but we are where we are.

The Minister must now make a determination for the 47th levy so that racing can plan for its future. He will be more than aware of the robust discussions going on between the bookmakers and the race courses about the levy. Does he share my view that Turf TV is a commercial decision divorced from the levy and does he believe that it would be wrong and not in the best interests of racing if his decision on the levy had the net effect of competition not flourishing? Hon Members will be aware that the major bookmakers believe that the introduction of Turf TV will lead to an increase in their costs. Does the Minister agree that the rationale used by the bookmakers for a £50 million reduction in the levy, from £85 million a year to £30 million a year, was based on the extra costs associated with receiving Turf TV?

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing the debate and I agree with what he is saying. I am sure that he will agree that a reduction of that proportion in the levy will not only affect prize money in elite racing, to the detriment of the sport, but be very detrimental to medium-sized race courses, such as Wincanton in my constituency, and there will be a knock-on effect on training yards, which will not be able to stable the same number of horses in the future.

Mr. Swire: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. Perhaps, if he is lucky enough to be called by the Chairman, he will speak further on it. The number of races has risen, and stakes and prizes are a serious issue. I do not think that a reduction of the nature that I mentioned would be in the best interests of racing, by which I mean race courses and bookmakers alike.

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central) (Lab): Has the hon. Gentleman calculated how many of the 57 race courses would close down in a period of five years if the levy became a commercial transaction?

Mr. Swire: The right hon. Gentleman brings much more experience to this debate than I. Maybe he has made that calculation; I have not. Suffice it to say that I think that a number of race courses would be left vulnerable if the levy were reduced in that way.

What conversations has the Minister had with the Advertising Standards Authority regarding the initial leaked findings, reported in the Financial Times on 6 November, disputing the basis of the bookmakers' figure? Turf TV believes that its product should cost £4 million extra a year for all bookmakers, whereas Satellite Information Services believes that the cost is closer to £50 million. Does he have a view on that?

As I said, the Minister must now decide the level of the 47th levy. Does he not agree that the best thing for racing would be to leave the levy at the same rate? That would undoubtedly fail to please bookmakers and race courses alike, but it would be a credible position for the Government at this time. Once he has made the new determination, will he redouble his efforts to bring all interested parties in racing together to modernise the levy in order to ensure more equitably racing's long-term future? It is an aspiration that should unite us all.

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) on securing this debate. I say "Friend" deliberately, because when I first came to this place, we served on a Committee together, and he was generous and kind. He has been very helpful in the short time that I have been here. On a personal basis, I think that he is a big loss to the Opposition Front Bench.

Mr. Swire: That has done for the rest of my career.

Mr. Devine: Absolutely. It is ruined now.

I want to deal with the poor put-upon pitch bookmakers, but first—recognising the subject of the debate and the fact that a court case is taking place on which we cannot comment—I shall refer to an article written by Barry Dennis, the well-known bookmaker from Channel 4. He pointed out in The Sun on 13 October that he had bet £20,000 with Betfair on a photo finish, the outcome of which he already knew. Within minutes he had earned nearly £2,000. The House needs seriously to look into such practices. Barry Dennis describes them in his article as fraud, and I do not think that that is an unfair description.

I speak in defence of on-course bookmakers, who happily relieved me of all my money at a recent meeting in Ayr. My good friend Frank Carroll managed to pick winners at 33:1, 25:1, 18:1 and 16:1, but sadly I did not listen to him. Bookmakers are important to the colour of horse racing. It is an enjoyable sport. My predecessor Robin Cook said that there were two thumps that he liked: one was the thump of a ballot box on the night of an election, and the other was the thump of horses' hooves at a race meeting. He was well known as a friend of racing, not just in this place but throughout the United Kingdom.

On 14 March this year, the Racecourse Association announced that it would confiscate assets from on-course bookmakers to which the race courses had never before expressed a claim. It was a bolt out of the blue. It was commercial opportunism, and I shall explain why. Since 1958, through various regulatory regimes, it has always been understood by all interested parties that list positions were assets held in perpetuity subject to the existence of the race course in question. The letter of 14 March was the first that on-course bookmakers, the National Joint Pitch Council, the body responsible for the administration of list positions as of 1998, or the Horserace Betting Levy

Board, the statutory board responsible for awarding certificates of approval—I agree with the hon. Member for East Devon that there are too many bodies in racing—had heard of the Racecourses Association's intention to cease to recognise list positions.

The chairman of the NJPC said on 13 November in a Culture, Media and Sport Committee oral evidence session that he was stunned by the announcement, and the levy board representative declared that he was surprised. Neither body could understand the justification for the RCA's announcement. It had been understood by all parties involved that list positions were held in perpetuity. Not only was it a shock for the bookmakers, but it threatened their livelihood, their retirement and their families. Before the RCA's announcement, the NJPC valued list positions at £70 million. After the announcement, it valued them at £40 million and falling daily. Those assets, bought in good faith, will be rendered worthless by 2012.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green) (Con): Does not the hon. Gentleman find it strange, as do I and perhaps many sitting in this Chamber, that those pitch positions were traded from day one of the NJPC's existence without the Racecourse Association commenting at any point that people were trading positions of which they had no ownership? The Government should make it clear that it was never their intention to allow the race courses to take away an absolute right that was being traded.

Mr. Devine: I agree totally. The right hon. Gentleman and I have both been involved in previous debates on the matter in this Chamber, and I think that our views are as one.

Why was the RCA's announcement so surprising? In 1998, the outmoded system of transfer through inheritance, or dead man's shoes as it was called, was replaced by a trading system. On-course bookmakers could finally buy and sell their assets. The post-1998 system was approved and adhered to by all parties involved, including the RCA, which was consulted at every stage of discussions and assented fully to the regime's establishment. Indeed, the race courses benefited from the system, as substantial sums from the commission and sales of list positions were spent on race course improvement. Everybody benefited.

Interestingly, at the Select Committee's oral evidence session on 13 November, the RCA said that it was the only party involved in the post-1998 trading system to believe that list positions bought by on-course bookmakers were not assets held in perpetuity.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): Would not the hon. Gentleman strengthen his argument further by reminding the Chamber that in 1998 a certificate of approval required that list positions be acknowledged and accepted?

Mr. Devine: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point, which I may not have included in my speech. It adds to my argument, and I am grateful for it.

The NJPC, the levy board and, most importantly, bookmakers—both buyers and sellers—thought that list positions were held in perpetuity, but the RCA said that it did not. That cannot be so. At the time, race courses had to recognise list positions to receive a certificate of approval from the levy board. The RCA could not have predicted a change in that arrangement. Like all other parties involved, it must have based its decisions on the assumption that the regime established in 1998 would continue. The only change that it might have predicted relates to the five times rule—the rent—which is an entirely separate issue. That is an important point. Furthermore, as Tom Clarke, the chairman of the NJPC, said, the RCA did not mention a time limit or raise the issue of list position tenure until the 88th meeting between all the parties involved. I repeat that it was the 88th meeting before the issue was first raised.

At the meeting on Wednesday 7 November between the Federation of Racecourse Bookmakers and the RCA, held under the Minister's auspices, the FRB asked the RCA to explain the timing of its decision. It asked why the RCA had waited until March 2007 to make the announcement given that, until then, the race courses had been perfectly happy with the status quo—the post-1998 system—and had never questioned the tenure of list positions. Something must have changed. In response to that question, one of the RCA representatives explicitly stated that the decision was made in March 2007, just after the new regulations came into force in February. If that is not an admission that the proposed theft—that is what it is—of bookmakers' assets had been facilitated by the Gambling Act 2005, then I do not know what is.

It is clear that the Select Committee was thoroughly unimpressed at the Racecourse Association's evidence. Although the other parties that gave evidence, including the NJPC and the levy board, understood that bookmakers held their list positions in perpetuity, the RCA said that it did not, despite having representatives on all statutory bodies. That does no credit to the race courses that are members of the RCA.

The RCA's chief executive disingenuously referred continually to property rights with regard to list positions, despite knowing full well, because he had been told on a number of occasions, including in front of the Minister, that on-course bookmakers had never argued that list positions conferred a property right. It has been explained to the RCA on numerous occasions that list positions are assets held in perpetuity, subject to the existence of the race course in question. Furthermore, I remind the House that the dispute is over the status of list positions—bookmakers' assets—and not the rent. It is important to make that point because of attempts to cloud the issue.

Issue 10 of the RCA's update for racecourses states that the proposal to move the five times rule to commercial arrangements between racecourses and bookmakers was originally made by the Government in March 2003. That statement disingenuously failed to recognise that the position papers of the Department for Culture, Media and Sport had recommended movement to commercial arrangements only from the five times rule. The Government's position on list positions, as stated in paragraph 2.6 of the DCMS paper, was that we had already seen the removal of the "dead man's shoes" on horse race courses and a move to fully commercial sale arrangements for pitches. Again, highlighting that point shows that the argument is flawed.

The RCA is effectively advocating the move to fully commercial arrangements, with all the implications that it would involve for racing. I am sure that the House will agree that it is an interesting proposition, as it totally undermines its argument. We already have fully commercial sale arrangements—on-course bookmakers buy and sell their list positions. The only problem for the RCA is that the race courses are not directly involved in those transactions. They want to be involved. They want more money. That is what they mean by commercial arrangements. However, although wanting more money is acceptable, it does not justify theft.

The RCA is disingenuously attempting to use the umbrella term "commercial arrangements" to refer to both rent and assets when they are, and should, remain entirely distinct and separate. As the Select Committee pointed out again and again, it is extremely difficult to understand why the race courses could not recognise bookmakers' list positions and at the same time undertake negotiations over the rent. That is what should have happened. On-course bookmakers have always been willing to negotiate over the rent. However, they also want their pitches back. Rent and assets are separate issues. We should not let the Racecourse Association muddy the water.

I call upon the race courses to disassociate themselves from the comments and actions of the chief executive of the RCA. I call on the RCA fully to recognise the list positions of on-course bookmakers. Failing that, the Government should bring in secondary legislation that invests the duty of preservation in a statutory body.

9.56 am

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) on securing this debate. I have initiated a number of debates on horse racing, and I know that there is tremendous interest in the sport and thus in the debates. I therefore congratulate my hon. Friend on securing a 90-minute debate, which allows a few more hon. Members to make a contribution.

My hon. Friend mentioned that holding the debate today is appropriate but also slightly difficult, given that the funeral of Sir Tristram Ricketts is taking place this afternoon. I pay a brief but personal tribute to Sir Tristram, who was well known throughout the sport. He always had time for everyone; he always had a smile, a joke, a word of wisdom for people. He will be sadly missed not only by the sport but by his many friends. I hope to set off for the funeral immediately after the debate. I suspect that I will have to stand outside, as so many people will be there. Nevertheless, it is important to be there. In that respect, it is a sad day.

My hon. Friend was right to say how important horse racing is to the country and to rural communities. He was right also to say that it is a magnificent spectacle. There can be no doubt that it is the envy of the world. It is my great privilege to represent what I consider to be the greatest race course in the world. Cheltenham race course at Prestbury Park falls within my Tewkesbury constituency. Of course, racing is equally important to those who represent tracks such as those at Hereford and Worcester—and, Mr. Atkinson, the smaller tracks such as Hexham—as that is where horses start their racing careers. They do not start at Cheltenham, although those that are lucky may end up there.

A great process has to be gone through in order to reach the top. All race courses are important. Whatever happens, and whatever decisions are taken, I hope that we retain 59 race courses—and possibly one or two more.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North and Sefton, East) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Robertson: And Aintree, of course.

Mr. Howarth: Although I am fond of Cheltenham, even the hon. Gentleman would have to confess that Aintree in my constituency is probably the premier race course.

Mr. Robertson: I agree with a lot of things that the right hon. Gentleman says, but I cannot quite agree with that comment. However, I may return to the point later. It says something about me that I know Members more by the race course that they represent than by their constituency.

Racing is a fantastic sport, and it is the envy of the world. Much of it is right and going in the right direction. The quality of the racing at Cheltenham this weekend was tremendous. However, there are problems. To highlight those problems is not an attempt to run the sport down; it is a refusal to be complacent about the future of the sport, which is probably what motivated my hon. Friend to hold this debate. It certainly motivated me to speak today. My comments are meant not to be negative but to act as something of a wake-up call to the industry's problems.

One problem was mentioned by my hon. Friend. There are so many different parts to racing—the horses, the owners, the jockeys, the trainers, the stable staff, the race courses, the bookies and the bodies that control racing. In a sense, that is its weakness, because all those elements are indispensable. If one removed jockeys there would obviously be no racing, and if one removed trainers there would be no racing either. Each element is extremely important, yet the industry seems unable to come together and progress in the right direction.

There are a number of current disputes, one of which relates to the emergence of Turf TV. I do not say that Turf TV is a bad thing in itself, but the emergence of a second provider of pictures to betting shops is causing difficulties, and a dispute on that is the last thing that racing needs. I do not want duplication of costs, because it will have a knock-on effect. My hon. Friend the Member for East Devon was absolutely right to say that, technically and legally, the dispute is nothing to do with the levy, but in the real world money has to be considered, and the fact is that there is only one pot, so something will have to give. If only half of race courses are featured in bookies in future, less money will be bet on racing in those shops, which means that less money will pass through the levy system. That brings us back to the same point: less money for race courses, and difficulties for them.

We need to look at things in the round. We cannot say that the levy is irrelevant, even if that is legally and technically correct. When bookmakers come to the Minister and tell him that they want to pay £35 million instead of £90 million, he will have to take everything into account. I hope that he will not reduce the levy payments, because that would have a negative effect on race courses, but the trend for the levy is downward.

I am emphatically not asking the Minister to scrap the levy; I am saying to racing that it should look beyond the levy, because the levy has had its day. We have to reach commercial agreements and find commercially realistic ways of funding racing.

Sandra Osborne (Ayr, Carrick and Cumnock) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, although a longer-term solution is needed, we first need a resolution of the current negotiations and of the position on the levy?

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Lady is right. The Minister will have to decide this year's levy, and I hope that he will do so shortly and without there being too much acrimony over the decision. I am not saying that the levy should be scrapped next year, or even the year after that. I am not saying anything at all to the Minister on that point. My comments are directed instead at the racing industry, because it must not be complacent and assume that the levy will remain for ever, or that it will always remain at its present level. As I have said, the recent trend has been downward, so industry representatives should not come to us saying, "The levy is not enough, long live the levy," because that argument will not be sustainable for too much longer.

I know that Lord Donoughue produced an important and impressive report whose interim conclusion was that there might be difficulties in finding commercial solutions and appropriate further arrangements. Nevertheless, those solutions must be found. I am not aware that football, cricket, tennis or any other sport in this country is financed by a tax, which is what the levy is. Nor am I aware that the Minister has power to intervene in football transfers or in Wimbledon prize money. That is not his role, and nor is it the role of any member of the Government. I want racing to change so that it grows in confidence and can create more income of its own, and there are ways in which it can do that.

One of the problems has been the European Union—that wonderful organisation that does British business so much good.

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): It is always a problem.

Mr. Robertson: Indeed. The EU stepped in and stopped the sale of pictures and data en bloc, but the same EU laws exist for other sports, so I do not think that racing can say, "There you are, Europe would not let us do it." We must look beyond that, and one possibility is singular selling, which replaces sale as a whole with individual sales.

We have all been at race courses in the rain and found ourselves unable to get a decent cup of tea or a decent meal in proper facilities. That is not true of all race courses. It is not true of Cheltenham, for instance, but it happens at an awful lot of other race courses, and they could gain much more income if they marketed themselves better and provided better facilities. I have heard the complaint that some young people will not go to a certain race course on a wet Monday afternoon. Why should they? They will go to race courses where there are proper facilities, and providing such facilities would give other race courses the opportunity to raise more money themselves.

Mr. Richard Benyon (Newbury) (Con): I agree with my hon. Friend. However, does he agree with me that it is now much more expensive for race courses to lay on a day's racing? They have all the pressures deriving from the regulatory burdens that apply to all industry, including the working time directive. They do not have the critical mass that other sports have, so the situation is tougher for them. In cases where a race course is failing to provide any sort of decent service to the public, I agree with my hon. Friend's comments, but the vast majority are trying their best and having a tough time of it.

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend makes a good point. We have all been at race courses where the racing has been held up because a second ambulance was not available. I am not saying that a second ambulance is unnecessary, but that is a small example of the health and safety difficulties. The extent of other regulations is a difficulty too, as are add-on costs. Nevertheless, some race courses could do more for themselves, and I think that they will have to.

While the levy has been in place there has always been an excuse not to look beyond it, and to avoid self-help. I agree that the levy should be continued for the foreseeable future, but the industry should try to generate more income for itself and possibly become less reliant on the bookmakers. The share of bookmakers' takings in betting offices is falling; I think that it is now about 50 per cent., but for greyhound racing it probably used to be 100 per cent. when betting shops were first licensed. The levy removes the incentive on bookmakers to promote racing, because they pay a levy on racing whereas they do not pay any levy on football bets. I say to the Minister that he should carry on with the levy but consider how racing can look beyond the levy and help itself. In 1998, I introduced a ten-minute Bill to try to deregulate race courses so that they could do more on non-race days, and that idea should be revisited, because race courses constitute a huge asset that is rarely used outside of racing days.

I turn to the situation on the Tote. I make no criticism of the current Minister, who was not in his job at the time of the recent legislation. His predecessor, the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn), has unfortunately left his seat, but I make no criticism of him either. When the Gambling Bill was being passed, an unusual aspect of it was that it did not include any stated purpose on the Tote. One purpose of the Bill was to transfer the Tote to a racing trust, and a shadow trust was set up which was chaired by Lord Lipsey, so the intention to transfer existed. Amazingly, however, that purpose was not stated in the Bill. Notwithstanding that, the Bill mentioned nationalisation, because the Government did not own the Tote so, before they could transfer it, they had to deal with the ownership position. However, the Bill did not deal with transfer to the trust. A number of us pointed out at the time that that was potentially difficult, and that has proved correct.

My hon. Friend the Member for East Devon is right that the figure for the transfer discussed at the time was £50 million. I argued that that was too much, because the Government did not own the Tote and no Government had put any money into it. The taxpayer was not owed anything, so I did not see why the Government should take any money out of the Tote—or rather, not out of the Tote but out of racing, as there was nowhere else for it to come from. We now find that the transfer figure is something like £400 million. If £50 million was unjust, £400 million is obscene. My speech is not party political, but the Government need to provide some answers on that.

At the time of the Bill's passage, our friends in Europe got involved yet again. The same old European Union said, "No, you cannot transfer it for that amount of money"—whatever figure applied at the time—"because that would be state aid." I really cannot see why that should be the case. How many civil servants did the Government employ? Did none of them see that coming when the 2005 Act was being drafted? I shall be kind and not blame the Government, but I think that Parliament has failed the Tote.

I believe also, however, that the increasing strength of the Treasury over the last 10 years has played its part in this. Yes, we can blame Europe—if there is an opportunity to blame Europe, I shall be there—but the man who was Chancellor for 10 years was so strong and powerful that he became Prime Minister, as we all know, and now £400 million is being quoted. No Government would willingly throw that away.

Mr. Don Foster: The hon. Gentleman keeps talking about the sums of money, but has not yet addressed—I hope that he will in a second—where that money will go. He will recall that although it is not mentioned in the Gambling Act 2005, the then Minister, the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn), gave a clear undertaking in Committee that a 50:50 split would enable 50 per cent. of the sale to go back into racing. Does he share the view that it would be very helpful if the Minister could confirm that on the record today?

Mr. Robertson: Yes, I hope that the Minister will confirm that. However, I am still concerned about the £400 million. Although the hon. Gentleman makes a very good point, my speech is more concerned with what will happen to the Tote. However, he is right and makes a very important point.

As I understand it, the consortium being put together is not coming up with the money that the Government—either because the Treasury needs it or because the European Union would object if it was any less—require. If that is the case, will the Minister give the Tote time for reflection? I am well aware that it has been years, since the then Home Secretary, now Secretary of State for Justice and Lord Chancellor, came to the Tote annual general meeting and pledged that it would be handed over to the Racing Trust. I am not asking the Minister to delay it for a few more years—far from it! However, if we have gone so long and so far down the road, can the Tote not be given perhaps just two or three months in which to reflect on the situation and perhaps consider other options? I say that for this reason: the Tote was set up in 1927 in order to benefit racing. I fear that if it is put on sale on the open market, it might cease to exist. That is unthinkable. Would the Cheltenham gold cup still exist? Would the Tote's financial contribution to racing still exist? That goes for many other things, too.

We have talked about the financing of racing and we recognise the pressures. The last thing that we need is for the amount that the Tote puts into racing to disappear simply because Parliament has botched the sale. If an agreement cannot be reached during the current negotiations, will the Minister please allow a period of reflection, so that we can look at what is going on, have discussions and decide on the way forward? Given that it has taken years to get to this point, I do not think that another three months or so is asking too much.

The hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Devine) talked at length about the pitch dispute. I do not want to get into that too much, other than to say that racing does not need yet another dispute, and I hope that it can be resolved. However, I must say that it cannot be a case of dead man's shoes—we must move on from that. I have every sympathy for the bookmakers who felt that they had bought the right to a pitch, but legally I do not think that they had. We must move forward commercially. I hope, however, that that can be done sensitively and with some recognition that people felt that they had bought a right to a living. However, the jobs for life, the dead man's shoes and the seniority that existed in the past are from a bygone age, and we must move on.

I thank you for your time, Mr. Atkinson. I apologise for having gone on for perhaps a little too long, but I think that there are some very important points to be discussed. However, I shall finish by echoing the words of my hon. Friend the Member for East Devon: racing is a fantastic sport and an absolutely wonderful spectacle. And long may it continue to be so.

10.14 am

Ms Celia Barlow (Hove) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) on securing this very important debate. I agree with him that Turf TV has immense implications throughout the industry. I would like to return, however, to the matter mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Devine) although his exposition of the problems of pitch bookmakers was so full that there is very little that I can add. However, I feel that I must add my weight to his cause, particularly in the interests of constituents of mine such as the Morrill family and Adrian Pariser.

Surely the current situation that many in the trackside betting industry find themselves in was never intended when the Gambling Act 2005 was first proposed, and it is important to look at the specific matter of trackside list positions and their future allocation. Obviously, the gambling industry as a whole has undergone immense change over the past few years. I disagree with the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) because I think that it is completely different from the inherited system that has damaged the livelihoods of constituents of mine and of the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) who has done so much to highlight the problems in recent years.

Throughout the many changes, however, the horse racing industry has shown a willingness to reform. Outmoded practices, such as the notion of an inherited seniority being handed down from parent to child have now given way to the trading of assets in a free and open market. The opening of trade in pick-list positions has led to much-needed fresh blood and new investment in the racing industry, but that fresh blood itself is feeling let down and abandoned by the industry, because those people are now being told that the pick positions, in which they invested so much money, are no longer theirs. Most in the industry would agree that changes made in recent years to modernise it have been of immense benefit to all parties concerned, until now perhaps.

The RCA will continue to argue, of course, that because it owns the physical asset, it is up to it to determine, by whatever means it sees fit, who trades there. However, we must say also that the pick position is merely the order in which a bookmaker can choose their position of trade on the race course, and not an actual physical pitch position. That distinction is obviously important to the RCA, but I suggest that the argument is deliberately two-dimensional in its thinking. An asset does not need to be physical. For example, a CD manufacturer does not own the music that it presses on to plastic. Already, we have agreed on, and spent many hours debating in this place, the concept of intellectual property. I argue also that there is such a thing as moral property, which is what the bookmaker owns.

The RCA clearly recognises the accrued value of a bookmaker's position on a pick-list, otherwise why would it be attempting to wrestle the control of the pick-list away from the bookmakers? Although it has always been acknowledged, ever since the 2001 gambling review report, that negotiations would take place on admissions charges for bookmakers to race courses, as my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston has mentioned, the tenure of list positions was never in question until March this year, despite numerous—88—meetings on the subject. It has always been understood by the buyer, seller and administrator that list positions were to be held in perpetuity.

The decision of the RCA to lay claim to the commercial benefits to be gained by the auction of valuable pitch positions has, as we have heard, stunned the National Joint Pitch Council, which set it up in the first place. It is quite disingenuous for the RCA to argue back in 2001, and then in 2003, that the Government advocated a change in the arrangement for pitch allocations and a move to commercial arrangements. It is a short-term smash and grab. I believe that the Government had no such intention, and that that is an interpretation of the 2005 Act, which serves only to increase the commercial gain of the RCA, at the expense of the very people and businesses without which there would be no trackside betting industry—in other words, the very people and business that, together with the trainers and jockeys, give the entire industry its flavour and value.

Indeed, the Government's recommendations went only as far as a change to the five-time rule. That refers to the rent of the pitch, not to the asset itself—the moral property. There is no reason why commercial arrangements by the RCA about the rent cannot take place while recognising the bookmakers' list positions, as it has always done. The RCA, again disingenuously, is attempting to use the umbrella term "commercial arrangements" to refer to both the rent and the assets, when, in fact, they are, always have been, and should remain entirely distinct and separate.

We are talking essentially about the livelihoods of hundreds of people in our gaming sector, but particularly about the family bookmakers, as we heard during the Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport sittings, which many Members present attended. The family bookmakers have spent generations in the industry, and my constituents who trade under the name, Taffy, have been hit by a triple whammy: first, over the father-child rule, secondly over pitch allocations and sales, about which I cannot go into detail because of actions taken by the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green, and finally, over losing the last thing that they possess—their pitch position. The family have been hit three times within one generation, but the measure will affect small rather than large bookmakers. Large bookmakers will also be damaged, but they have large assets, and we are discussing small, family firms.

Trackside bookmakers are asking for nothing more than clarity about the assets that they have accrued either through generations of hard work or by commercial acquisition. Let us not forget that some bookmakers in the south-east have spent more than £1 million buying something that they believed they would hold in perpetuity. We want those assets to continue to be recognised as the industry standard, as all concerned have always understood them to be—that is until suddenly last March when the bombshell was dropped on the bookmakers.

For the RCA to use the period of transition between the passing of the Gambling Act 2005 and its implementation as a means to wrest control of the assets of hundreds of trackside bookmakers is a blatant misinterpretation of the Act as it was intended. We have it in our power to set out in clear guidelines for both the RCA and the bookmakers precisely which areas are open to reform under the new legislation, and which areas are not. We, as legislators, have a responsibility to take any misinterpretation of legislation on board and clarify it, not leave it entirely up to the industry. Until the guidance is made clear, the trackside betting industry will remain at an effective standstill. Until we clearly define the parameters of the 2005 Act, many in the industry will not know whether their most important commercial asset, which involves the future of their children and their business, is to be rendered entirely worthless. The situation is entirely unacceptable.

Philip Davies: I agree wholeheartedly with the hon. Lady. As somebody who sits on the Culture, Media and Sport Committee, I recognise the position that she outlines, but if the RCA decides to press on and the Government will not intervene, does she at least agree that the bookmakers concerned should be compensated for the loss of their assets? If she agrees, does she think that the compensation should come from the race courses or from the Government?

Ms Barlow: I agree that should the RCA continue in that way—and I sincerely hope that it will not because it is not a moral route—it should compensate the bookmakers to an amount equivalent not to their current value, but to their value before the bombshell was dropped on them.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: I am mindful of what my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Philip Davies) says, but the money for the pitches never went to the race courses in the first place; it went up and down families, or they bought from friends or associates. The National Joint Pitch Council is more responsible than the race courses, is it not?

Ms Barlow: I am going into the details not about responsibility, but about what the RCA plans to do. We must look to the future rather than to the past. However, the RCA is taking the assets. Whatever the responsibility in the past, the RCA will benefit; it is taking a commercial property away from families who have owned it for generations. Therefore, the RCA is entirely responsible. We should all do everything in our power to ensure that the commercial trading of pick-list positions remains where it has always been—not taken in a short-term smash-and-grab raid. It should stay in the hands of the bookmakers themselves.

Mr. Ben Wallace (Lancaster and Wyre) (Con) rose—

Sandra Osborne rose—

Mr. Peter Atkinson (in the Chair): Order. Two Members wish to catch my eye, and I propose to call the winding-up speeches at half-past 10. Will they bear that in mind?

Mr. Ben Wallace (Lancaster and Wyre) (Con): Thank you, Mr. Atkinson, I shall therefore be brief. I shall reflect on the state of the Tote, but first perhaps I should declare an interest. My wife was a working member of the Tote at its headquarters in Wigan, so I had a peculiar insight into the process.

It is time that the Government brought forward their plans for the Tote, because they opened up the process. My colleagues on the Culture, Media and Sport Committee and I have, over the past two years, consistently asked for an update, but we have consistently received the reply, "It's all right, it's just about to happen. Don't you worry," mainly from the Minister's predecessor, the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn)—almost like a bad joke during an after-dinner speech. The replies have continued, but nothing else has.

I remember that way back there was support for the sale of the Tote because of the Government's assurance that it would be given to racing. However, while we are in a position of paralysis, it is important to consider the advice in 1996 given by the Home Office, when it was under my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), when it reflected on the problems that any change in the Tote's status would produce. The first point was that the Tote was not large enough for public flotation, and it would be exposed to competitors that would pull it apart. We know that that is still a real fear. Sale by competitive tender, the advice continued, could not be ruled out, but would raise difficulties because of the need to guarantee that the Tote continued to support racing to the extent it had hitherto, which is exactly the case today.

Finally, the advice stated that the option of vesting in a racing body would require examination of whether the grant of an exclusive licence to operate pool betting on horse racing would be appropriate, and that such a licence would have to ensure that the Tote's profits were applied in the best interests of racing and with the minimum disruption to the Tote and race courses. However, that raised difficult competition issues. If we had only listened 11 years ago to that advice, we would not be in this position.

Anyone who has ever gone to the European Commission or to many other European Union organisations will have had a working relationship with the directorate-general for competition. In my previous job, I had to have a working relationship with that directorate-general, with the Commission and with UKRep—the United Kingdom Permanent Representation to the European Union—which is of course there to battle for Whitehall's interest in such cases.

Mr. Duncan Smith: Oh, yes.

Mr. Wallace: Exactly.

It is clear that the team from the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, which the Government put to task in UKRep, was wholly inadequate. The Treasury team has competition expertise; the DCMS team in UKRep was worse than amateur. That is the situation today. Even my wife, who is much brighter and more qualified than me, pointed that out to a board director and to the former Minister, but she was told, "Don't worry your pretty little head." I can remember that, and I am sure that the ex-Minister is now worrying his pretty little head.

We must analyse the utter incompetence that has delivered such uncertainty to the marketplace. What will happen to all those workers in Wigan, to the future contributions of the Tote and to that excellent body itself? As a Conservative, I believe that if it ain't broke, don't fix it, but we are in a wholly self-created mess with the Tote, and we should not forget the relevant manifesto commitment.

Where do we go now? Looking back at the options that have been on the table, I believe that Viscount Astor's proposals in 1999, or slightly later, could certainly give us one way out by mimicking a national lottery-style licensing of the operation. We must consider whether to take up that idea or retain the status quo. However, it is time for the Government to produce answers on the Tote.

10.29 am

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) on securing the debate, and all right hon. and hon. Members who have contributed to what has been a stimulating discussion. I also join many of those who paid tribute to Tristram Ricketts. He will be sadly missed by racing. Were he with us today, he would remind us how important racing is to the economy, that almost 20,000 people are employed directly by it and that if we take all the satellite industries, including betting, into account, the figure rises to almost 100,000 people. He would also, no doubt, remind us of the study by Deloitte last year, which demonstrated that its contribution to the economy overall is nearly £3 billion, and of the nearly £300 million that is paid annually in taxation into the Treasury's coffers. More importantly, he would point out how popular racing is with the people of this country. It is the second most popular sport to football, with some 6 million people attending race courses last year alone. Of course, he would remind us that we are the envy of the world because we undoubtedly have the best racing. Eight of the 12 top races are held in this country and even today the nation stops for some of those races—for example, the grand national.

Racing is critical. However, we are talking about the future and, in that respect, it is important to recognise that we have a new regulatory body. I am delighted by the work that has been done in such a short time by the British Horseracing Authority, which is working on some innovative ideas for the timetabling of racing that will be of enormous benefit to the betting industry: if there are more races, there is more opportunity for it to make profits. That should be borne in mind in some of our future debates.

The BHA has also been building on work that has been done, including work to improve the security and integrity of the sport. We should not forget the huge costs borne by the racing industry in terms of guaranteeing the integrity of racing. Some £24 million a year is spent in that particular endeavour. However, many other activities are engaged in, including—importantly, but so far not referred to—education and training and the welfare of jockeys, as the hon. Member for Hove (Ms Barlow) mentioned.

We have to bear in mind that racing has huge costs, and it is important to take that into account when considering issues such as the levy or the future of the Tote. If we want a bright future for a sport that is already successful, we have to ensure that it has the resources coming into it to enable it to develop and grow and to deal with issues including securing the integrity of the sport and increasing prize money, as well as other things that hon. Members mentioned. That is why I am disappointed that the proposal to roll the levy forward for another 12 months—to give another opportunity for debate about streamlining and modernisation to take place—has not been possible and that the bookmakers have forced it to determination.

We are now in a situation whereby the Secretary of State, for the first time since the 41st scheme back in 2002-03, has to decide how to proceed. I urge him and the Minister to make that determination as quickly as possible. The current scheme runs out on 31 March 2008. Everybody knows that in planning the future of a significant business, time is needed to get the financial planning right. An early determination, enabling us to know what sum is coming in through the levy, is crucial. It is critical that we get a quick determination by the Secretary of State.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that a reduction in the levy would hit Scotland disproportionately hard? Most of the horses are trained in the south of England, which involves transport costs to Scotland, particularly to the race course in Perth in my constituency which is the most northerly in the UK. If there is a reduction levy, there will be a reduction in prize money, which might be a massive disincentive for horse trainers and owners to come to race courses like the one in Perth.

Mr. Foster: The hon. Gentleman makes a valuable point that I was not aware of. I am grateful to him for drawing it to my attention. No doubt, had he had more time, he would have said how wonderful the race courses in his constituency are, as other right hon. and hon. Members have done. I put on the record how wonderful Bath race course is, lest that be forgotten.

The hon. Gentleman is right. That is why my second plea to the Minister, in respect of his advising the Secretary of State on the determination, is that something is done to ensure that we have a fair settlement. The Minister will be well aware that a determination under the 41st scheme suggested a figure of somewhere between £90 million and £110 million coming in. If that were rolled forward in respect of inflation alone, it would be brought up to some £130 million, which is what is needed.

I hope that the Minister will not listen to the siren voices talking about the woes befalling the betting industry because of the row between Satellite Information Services and Turf TV. As the hon. Member for East Devon so rightly said, that is a separate commercial argument that must be sorted out on that basis and should not, in any way, influence the Secretary of State's decision. Like many others, I am enormously worried that the legal battles going on between those two companies could end up costing some £5 million, which will be taken away from racing. That is to be regretted.

In making the determination, I hope that the Minister will look carefully at betting exchanges—a new phenomenon—which are not making a fair contribution to racing because of how they are taxed under the current regime. The most important thing of all is time. A quick determination is critical.

The money issue also raises the problem with the Tote. A quick determination on that is equally important. I hear what the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) says about the need for a bit more time—he suggests three months—but if there is very much more time, there is unlikely to be a Tote worth selling, because a large number of people are now leaving it, it is having difficulty recruiting new people and some of its senior staff are leaving. It is critical that there is a relatively quick outcome. I accept his point about getting the deal right, but it must be done fairly quickly.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: The matter needs deciding pretty quickly. My point is that if the Tote is sold on the open market, the jobs that hon. Members have mentioned, including some 500 jobs in Wigan, could all go. All I am saying is that we need a three-month period just for reflection.

Mr. Foster: If the Tote goes to the open market and one of the major firms buys it, the hon. Gentleman is right: there could be a huge loss of jobs, particularly in the north. I hope that a deal can be found under which it is sold as was originally intended—he and I served on the Committee dealing with the Horserace Betting and Olympic Lottery Bill—and goes to a racing consortium so that it is kept within racing. That is what we were promised and what we understood we were signing up to. As I mentioned in an intervention, if it is at all possible I want the Minister to give a commitment that at least 50 per cent. of money from the sale of the Tote will go into racing.

On the list pitches, I agree with the contributions of the hon. Members for Livingston (Mr. Devine) and for Hove. Everybody to whom I have talked is convinced that that was a separate issue, with the rent on one hand and the asset on the other. There was no understanding that the asset was being given up or that the five times rule was going, with people saying, "Yes, that was understood. It's time to prepare for it." There was no understanding that the asset was going. I welcome the Minister's trying to knock heads together to find a solution. I know that the Culture, Media and Sport Committee is also considering this issue. I hope that he can give us some information as to what progress is being made. It is critical that we get a solution to that dilemma as well.

Racing is critically important to this country. It is loved by millions and it has a bright future. However, a number of vital issues have to be resolved. The Minister has got a big job on his plate, because a lot of the decisions fall to him. I wish him the best of luck, but I hope that he will take racing's interests into serious consideration in making his determination.

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), who, as always, spoke with expertise on the matter. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) on securing this timely debate, which has been interesting and stimulating. I join him in paying tribute to Sir Tristram Ricketts, who played such an active role over four decades in the very subject that we are talking about.

My hon. Friend summed up with clarity the challenges facing the industry. I am grateful for the deluge of material that many of the organisations and parties whose representatives are sitting at the back of the room have sent my way in the past few days. Of course, it is not I who is in a position to resolve the issues but the Government, who have not gained a reputation for decisive action. I am reminded of Shakespeare's famous horse quotation from "Richard III", of which everyone will be aware. At the battle of Bosworth, Richard III wants to continue the battle and is willing to trade his kingdom for a horse. In contrast, today we have a Minister who wants to avoid the battle completely and runs away from anything to do with horses. The consequences of that have allowed the British horse racing industry to enter a protracted period of confusion. I am, of course, being entirely disingenuous to the current Minister, who has worked hard to get on top of his brief and been approachable and friendly, but it is his watch now and he needs to make amends for the errors of his predecessors.

The Tote has been with us in one form or another since 1928, when it was the Horserace Totaliser Board, to give it its full name. It operates as a bookmaker and offers pool betting on horses. It has been the Government's intention to sell the Tote for some time; we first got a inkling that it might happen way back in May 1999. It was an election pledge in June 2001 and in May 2005, and I am sure that it would have been an election pledge in November 2007 had we had an election. I wonder what the odds are against its appearing again in a manifesto in June 2009 or whenever the election is.

There have been more than seven years of briefing versus counter-briefing, bids agreed then scuppered, prices confirmed then rebuffed, and Government announcements and then retractions. As we have heard, the Opposition fully support the sale of the Tote, but in a timely fashion, as reiterated by my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Wallace). I asked the Minister in a parliamentary question only two months ago whether the Tote would be sold in the next three months. His reply was that the Government were in advanced stages of discussions. Two months on, will he update us? What are those advanced stages, what value is the Tote now set at, who is leading the consortium to buy it and how much of the money will go back into racing? I understand that Lord Davies of Oldham said in the other place in July that the cost of trying to sort out the sale of the Tote had already climbed to £2 million. Will the Minister confirm exactly what the cost to the taxpayer is? I am sure that it is in our interests to find out.

The horse racing levy is the agreed annual amount paid by bookmakers to race courses, and it goes towards such things as prize money, the grass roots of the sport, veterinary skills and so forth. It is valued between £85 million and £90 million. As was stated in Lord Donoughue's study for the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, which has been referred to several times, all sides agree that the levy should eventually be phased out and replaced with a commercial alternative. Unfortunately, by the deadline of 31 October, racing and the bookmakers had failed to reach an agreement on the 2008-09 levy, meaning that determination now falls to the Secretary of State.

The sticking point, as we have heard, is commercial television rights. Traditionally, horse race footage has been beamed into betting shops by SIS, which is predominantly owned by a number of the large bookmakers, including William Hill and Ladbrokes. Turf TV, a new race course broadcaster, has been established and signed up to by about half the race courses. That means that bookmakers must now have two contracts, with SIS and with Turf TV, if they are to show the full complement of racing on offer in the UK.

The two sides of the argument have been well rehearsed: one either supports the levy and says that it should be reduced to compensate for the funds earned by Turf TV, or says that it should remain and that broadcasting rights are separate from any discussions about the levy itself. Sadly, Lord Donoughue could not find a solution, but it was established that all parties agreed to the long-term aim of abolishing the levy and replacing it with a commercial alternative. I was pleased to hear from the British Horseracing Authority in meetings yesterday that it agreed to a wider modernisation review of the levy.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) reiterated the points about the duplication of costs. Does the Minister agree that, with a long-term commercial solution required, running two broadcasting systems needs to be reviewed if funding to support the racing industry is to be maximised while bookmakers are offered an attractive deal? Alternatively, does he believe that horse racing can receive the critical financial support that it needs with the broadcasting monopoly broken up? I look forward to his response, as I understand that he is already starting talks with an independent organisation to mediate between the groups. What are his views on the short-term requirement to sort out the levy for this year and the long-term challenge of resolving and removing it?

The final act in the Government's three-ring circus of equine confusion, if I may call it that, is the issue of bookmakers' course pitches at race meetings. For many years, bookmakers had assumed that their pitches on race courses were theirs to use or sell on. Their value hinged on the so-called list system, reflecting the greater choice of pitches for people higher up the list. Location is critical, as it is linked directly to the amount of revenue that a bookmaker might receive. Charges to bookmakers were limited to five times the entry fee of the course, which changed in 2003 following a position paper from the Department. The change modernised the charges but there was no agreement on changes to list positions, which had been traded for some value for many years. Along came the Gambling Act 2005, which removed the responsibility for track betting licences from the Horserace Betting Levy Board and gave it to local authorities, with no longer any mention of list positions. That was the fundamental flaw in the 2005 Act.

The Racecourse Association was quick to announce that, by 2012, bookmakers' list positions would no longer be recognised. There seems to be no official documentation showing that pitch ownership was ever to be in perpetuity, but conversely I understand that there is also no official documentation showing that it was not. That is a complete legislative nightmare. How on earth did we get there? It certainly seems that the sport of kings is being managed by a Ministry of court jesters.

What action is the Minister taking, and what time scale is he adopting? What parties and intermediaries are being involved? Does he believe, for example, that race courses should take a small percentage of bookmakers' profits provided that there is a fairer charge, linked to earnings, so relinquishing the need to interfere with the list? Will he be using section 151(2) of the 2005 Act, which allows the Secretary of State directly to influence the form and contents of premises licences?

We have heard a number of eloquent speeches, and everyone has joined in supporting the industry. We can rightly be proud of horse racing in the UK, and certainly of its role in the economy. It is a multi-billion pound industry with more than 9,000 races a year, including eight of the top, world-class races. However, that position is not guaranteed. We need better co-operation within the industry and stronger leadership from the Government. I hope that the Minister will not duck his responsibility to help to resolve the concerns that we have debated, which affect the horse racing industry.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Atkinson. We were formerly two Whips together and worked closely in the dark arts of the Whips Office.

I welcome this important debate, secured by the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire). I add my support to his views on Sir Tristram Ricketts. Today is a sad day, as racing has lost somebody who had such a sharp mind. I met him on only a couple of occasions, but he had a great love for racing and wanted to ensure that it succeeded. He will be sadly missed and I pass on my condolences to his family.

The debate and the spirit in which hon. Members have contributed to it have been important. I was particularly pleased by the contributions by my hon. Friends the Members for Livingston (Mr. Devine) and for Hove (Ms Barlow), and by the hon. Members for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) and for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Wallace). We need to consider how we can move forward together. We heard some thoughtful comments about the impact on racing and its future.

Like the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), we should start by celebrating horse racing and its impact on the economy. Horse racing is healthy and buoyant, and is second only to football in British sport in terms of attendance at fixtures and revenue earned. Total race course attendance in 2006 was just under 6 million, the total having been on a significant upward trend since 2000, when 5.1 million people went racing. The current figures are the highest since the 1960s. The appeal of racing is universal: it appeals to people of all ages, backgrounds and socio-economic groups.

Not only do more people attend racing; many more people watch it on TV. The average TV audience for racing is 1.3 million for BBC 1 and 774,000 for BBC 2. Some 9.5 million people watched the grand national, and the 2007 Derby attracted 3 million viewers. In 2006, 197 meetings were broadcast terrestrially—151 on Channel 4 and 46 on the BBC. Channel 4 has the successful "The Morning Line" programme that attracts an average audience of 658,000 to racing, and has an hour-long programme dedicated to racing. At The Races is available in more than 9 million homes, and Racing UK, which is owned by 31 leading British race courses, has around 50,000 subscribers.

The economic facts speak for themselves. The racing and racehorse breeding industries are together directly responsibly for 18,800 full-time equivalent jobs. As the hon. Gentleman said, a report by Deloitte in 2006 found that racing employs more people than any other sport in Britain. Taking into account the secondary employment in the betting industry that he mentioned—it is impossible to imagine racing thriving without on-course bookmaking—the figure rises to 88,000.

Racing on Britain's 59 racecourses—with a 60th soon to open in Essex—generates some £300 million in tax revenues for the Government each year, and has an overall economic impact of £2.86 billion. Total prize money reached a record of £104.1 million in 2006, compared with £71.7 million in 2000. There are about 9,500 active racehorse owners, and 50,000 people are involved in racehorse ownership through various types of co-ownership. About 14,500 horses are in training, and 1,415 fixtures have been programmed in the current year, with over 9,000 races.

As for betting, £10 billion is bet off-course on horse racing every year, most of it in the 8,500 licensed betting offices in Britain, with a further £120 million bet on-course through the Tote. Bookmakers' profits on British racing alone are more than £1 billion a year, and the levy board received some £98 million from off-course bookmakers and the Tote in 2006-07. Those figures show not only that racing is a deeply engrained pastime and part of our national sporting life, but that it makes a strong and growing contribution to the economy of the country, including in some of the more deprived areas that we have heard about.

I know that the welfare of racehorses has been of concern to many people over the years. The Animal Welfare Act 2006 came into force earlier this year, and we believe that it is a significant step forward, as there is now a positive duty on owners and keepers of animals to promote welfare. I was sad to see that two horses were killed at Cheltenham at the weekend, and I send my condolences to all those involved.

We have the 2006 Act in place, and we have a particular position on racing. It is not the case, as the hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Ellwood) said, that the Government want to abdicate their responsibilities. I do not think that I have avoided any battles; in fact, I got involved in a few battles very quickly in my role as the Sports Minister.

On the specific issues, the chairman of the Horserace Betting Levy Board has, to our regret, again asked my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to determine the level of the annual horse race betting levy.

Sandra Osborne: I thank my hon. Friend for giving way and for meeting me during the summer recess, when he expressed a hope, and perhaps even an expectation, that the industry would be able to manage its own affairs. Sadly, that has not proved to be the case. He knows that although the Ayr racecourse has thrived in recent years, the investment would definitely be put at risk if the levy were reduced in any way. Does he agree with the levy board chairman, Mr. Hughes, who said:

"I don't think you can mix statutory payments with commercial elements, particularly where they may be seen to involve inducements"?

Does he agree that any matters relating to Turf TV are separate from the negotiations on the levy?

Mr. Sutcliffe: I understand and share many of my hon. Friend's concerns. Let me set out the Government's position. We do not want to pre-judge what the determination will be, but we hope to announce it early in the new year to meet the requests of hon. Members. The levy has only just gone to determination, and we have not yet appointed consultants to assist the Secretary of State in his deliberations. However, my predecessor and my officials have followed the levy board's discussions closely and we are fully aware of the importance of having fair and timely outcomes for the racing industry.

I confirm that, in line with the recommendations of the future funding of racing review group, which my noble Friend Lord Donoughue chaired in 2005, we still plan to review the workings of the levy scheme to see whether there is any way in which the machinery can be streamlined and simplified. I hope that the levy board will share the burden of that work with my Department. Obviously, that review can happen only when the 47th levy is determined. As my predecessor, my right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn), told the House late last year, we have no plans to abolish the levy until a viable commercial alternative emerges.

Mr. Anthony Wright (Great Yarmouth) (Lab): I share the opinions of many hon. Members in the Chamber today about the importance of the levy to race courses such as mine in Great Yarmouth. The betting industry provides up to £130 million of investment through the levy and other things, and there is sponsorship on top of that. Has there been any indication from the industry that it wants to reduce that amount, or is it prepared to keep the money as it is?

Mr. Sutcliffe: Again, that will be determined during the discussions on the determination. I do not want to get drawn into those arguments today. We will make the determination, we will consider everything that has been put to us, and we will try to work in the best interests of racing.

The determination will take place and we will look at the future of the levy system, as we have outlined. I agree with the hon. Member for Tewkesbury that it is important that racing looks to its future as well. Clearly, there are many sides that contribute to racing, and we have to ensure that they look to the future, too. I want the Government to remove themselves from the detail, although we will carry out our responsibilities.

Time is against us, so I want to concentrate on some of the major issues. On the sale of the Tote, I accept that there have been difficulties, including those in relation to the 500 jobs in Wigan. We must ensure that we do this properly. We have been chided about the role of Europe, but Europe played a big part in preventing the sale from taking place. We want to sell to racing, but we are considering the offer that has been made, and we need to make a quick decision. We must ensure that we go through the due process and look at the detail of all the bids. I can give the assurance that the hon. Member for Bath was looking for regarding what will happen if we do not sell the Tote to racing and it goes on the open market. The agreement was that 50 per cent. would go to the horse racing industry, and I am happy to put that on the record.

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): If it is not possible to sell the Tote to racing—it is almost certain that any sale will be challenged in the European Court—does not the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Wallace) have a point when he says if it ain't broke, don't fix it? Will the Government consider leaving it exactly as it is or having a licensing system like the lottery? There was no manifesto commitment to sell the Tote on the open market.

Mr. Sutcliffe: That is an important point. First, let us make the determination. We need to do that quickly for the reasons that have been outlined. Again, I agree with the hon. Member for Tewkesbury: we ought to look at the options that are available to us if that is not successful. I am happy to give the commitment that we will do that.

The Select Committee is looking into pitch tenure. I want to resolve the matter. We have set up a working group with an independent chair. We want to ensure that all sides of the argument, including the race courses and bookmakers, benefit from such a group. It is important to do that rather than going to law. People in racing tend to go to law very quickly, whether it be Turf TV or because of pitch tenure, which incurs huge cost. However, that money could go into racing, and we want to ensure that it is spent wisely for the future of racing.

Hon. Members raised a number of points that I cannot respond to in the time left. However, I will put in writing to those who have attended the debate the details on the questions that were asked. I urge that there are more debates on horse racing, that we look with interest at the work of the all-party group on horse racing and that we try to meet the challenges together. I accept that politics sometimes comes into play, but I hope that that will not prevent us from working together for racing's benefit.

Welsh Ports (Customs/Security)

Mr. Stephen Crabb (Preseli Pembrokeshire) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to open this debate on customs and security at Welsh ports. I am not sure whether the Minister will regard it as a respite or yet another irritation amid the maelstrom of bad news that has descended on her Department in the past 24 hours, but I hope that it will be a useful opportunity to engage with her on an important and pressing matter. I am grateful that she is here and that she has agreed to wind up the debate by about 25 minutes past 11 to enable me to get to the Chamber, where I have the first question on today's Order Paper.

I shall try to save some time to allow the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Albert Owen) to say a few words about the situation in north Wales. Like me, he is a strong friend of his local ports and enjoys good working relationships with the port management. He, too, would like to raise some concerns this morning.

This is a timely debate, given the wider discussion on national security and the integrity of our borders in the context of the challenges posed by terrorism, organised crime and illegal immigration. There is a specifically Welsh dimension to the problem as the ports of Wales together form an important entry point into the UK. Perhaps they do not have the same significance as the ports of south-east England in terms of overall passenger numbers and freight volumes, but if ports such as Dover, Folkestone, Felixstowe and Harwich and the airports at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted are the front door to the UK, the ports of Wales are the back door. They need securing and protecting as well, and that is what this debate is about.

My county of Pembrokeshire in west Wales is home to two major ferry routes to Ireland from Fishguard and Pembroke Dock, both of which carry thousands of passenger and commercial vehicles each week. The port of Milford Haven in my constituency is also one of the UK's major energy ports. It has two large oil refineries and one of Europe's largest fuel storage depots, and next year two large liquefied natural gas import terminals will come on stream. Further afield in Wales, the ports of Holyhead in north Wales and Swansea in the south, with their major links to Ireland, are also very important. The ferry ports of Wales together account for around 15 per cent. of the entire volume of ferry traffic arriving in the UK every year.

If terrorism, trafficking in narcotics and persons, and illegal immigration form the strategic context for this debate, the deep and severe cuts in customs cover that have taken place at Welsh ports in recent years form the operational context, and the move to an intelligence-led, risk-based system of deployment is the policy backdrop. Overarching all that is a question of resources that simply cannot be ignored.

Since 2003, the number of front-line uniformed customs officers in south Wales has been reduced by nearly 75 per cent. That strategy, which was embodied in the law enforcement business plan, included the complete withdrawal of permanent customs cover from the ports of Swansea, Newport and Pembroke in 2003. Those customs officers were responsible for the major docks, ferry ports and airfields across the region.

[Mr. Stephen Crabb]

I understand that an operational team covering north Wales, which was based in Chester, was also removed. Its role was to be taken over by two small teams based in Cardiff and Holyhead, which were to be supplemented by mobile teams that could be deployed anywhere in Wales or the wider customs region on an intelligence-led basis. In reality, the brigade teams have relentlessly focused on the midlands and the south-east at the expense of Wales.

Mark Williams (Ceredigion) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that public perception is very important, and that the notion of a roving team of Customs and Excise officials based in the midlands that comes periodically—very periodically—to Wales is no substitute for permanent staff in inspiring confidence in the Customs and Excise service?

Mr. Crabb: The hon. Gentleman raises an important point about perceptions and the need for people in Wales to feel that they are being adequately covered, but the matter is even more important than that. It is about operational effectiveness, and I want to get to the heart of that in the next few minutes.

I have been told that no checks whatsoever are now carried out on commercial traffic through Pembroke Dock, which is a major Welsh port and a main route for Irish and European traffic wishing to avoid the long journey through France. The chances of non-commercial traffic being stopped have become exceptionally slight. Overall, there has been a 50 per cent. reduction in permanent customs cover for Wales. The withdrawal also means that there is now practically no permanent front-line uniformed coverage from Cardiff to Holyhead—some 500 miles of coastline.

It is not scaremongering or an exaggeration to say that that approach to detection and enforcement at ports of entry is creating a situation whereby Welsh ports risk becoming a soft touch for those who would seek to use them for the illegal movement of freight and persons. In his report last year on the review of counter-terrorism legislation, Lord Carlile said that "in my view their intelligence-led 'brigading' system of deployment leaves some potentially vulnerable ports of entry without Customs officers at times. Probably they simply do not have enough officers to provide the sort of cover that could be regarded as best practice."

He also warned that customs officers are so thin on the ground that they are "no discouragement to terrorists".

Albert Owen (Ynys Môn) (Lab): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way on that important point. Lord Carlile visited the port of Holyhead in my constituency and spoke to the port authority there. He was happy with the overall security measures, because although there has been a reduction in the number of customs officers on the front line—most of them went when the area became a common travel area—the numbers of police officers and port security officers employed by the port authority have gone up. When Lord Carlile went to Holyhead, he assessed the whole security issue and not just Customs and Excise.

Mr. Crabb: That is an important intervention. The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right that we should not see customs cover as ultimately separate from the wider security arrangements. If Lord Carlisle made that judgment about Holyhead, I am very pleased, but the police and customs officers to whom I spoke said that there was significant concern about ports across Wales generally and the weakness of customs cover at them.

What are the practical consequences of this state of affairs? First, at the same time that customs cover has been eroded, there has been a fall in the overall volume of drugs seized by customs. There is no evidence to suggest that the decline in seizures is because of a decline in the overall trade. The success of the Serious Organised Crime Agency last May in preventing what would have been the largest ever shipment of cocaine across the Atlantic into Wales via the Pembrokeshire coast is a stark warning of the scale of the threat that still exists.

The failure of the current strategy is borne out by figures that were provided to me by the Public and Commercial Services Union. They show a strong correlation between the decline in the amount of drugs seized by customs in the past three years and a fall in the street prices of various popular drugs during the same period. The amount of cocaine seized last year was less than one third of that seized just three years previously: 5,800 kg in 2005-06 compared with more than 20,000 kg in 2003-04. Over the same period, the per gram street price of cocaine dropped sharply. The figures for heroin, cannabis, ecstasy and crack cocaine all show the same relationship.

Those drugs are having a devastating impact on many communities in Wales. The police tell me that they are particularly concerned about the cheap heroin flooding into south and west Wales. We need to be careful about implying that a correlation means causation, but there is no doubt in my mind that the drop in customs seizures as a result of the removal of permanent customs cover at Welsh ports is allowing a greater flow of illegal drugs into Wales through Welsh ports, and that that is a contributory factor to the overall drugs problem in Wales.

In the past year, we have marked the bicentenary of the Act abolishing the transatlantic slave trade. There has been a strong focus on human trafficking as one of the modern forms of slavery that needs to be stamped out. We know that the UK, with its booming illegal sex industry controlled by criminal gangs, is now a major destination for girls and young women being trafficked from eastern Europe, south-east Asia and north and west Africa. We should not engage in the fantasy that the victims of this grotesque trade are to be found only in London. A recent report on trafficking by Amnesty International suggested that Wales is now also home to a "sophisticated and extensive" trade in humans. Amnesty estimates that there are some 60 to 100 victims in Cardiff at any one time and, in a series of major police raids on massage parlours in Cardiff, Swansea and Bridgend last year, the vast majority of prostitutes discovered were illegal immigrants. There was a strong suspicion that many had been trafficked. It is obviously hard to quantify numbers because the trade is hidden, but outreach workers assisting sex workers in Cardiff report that about 50 per cent. of the girls and women they meet are foreign, and they believe that many of those girls have been trafficked.

There is little strong evidence to suggest or to prove that many of those girls are being trafficked through Welsh ports as opposed to reaching Wales via England, but I have spoken to police and customs officers who tell me that they are concerned that girls and young women are being trafficked through Welsh ports. It was suggested to me that the route into the UK from Europe and North Africa via northern Spain and Ireland into Welsh ports is increasingly seen by traffickers as a less risky route than the traditional route from the continent via the south-east ports.

This is a timely discussion, given the Prime Minister's announcement last week of a new UK border agency. His promise of an integrated system is welcome, but restructuring institutions and reshuffling personnel is not the whole story, and the resourcing issue must be addressed.

I opened my comments by referring gently to the calamitous news that broke yesterday about the missing child benefit claimant records. It would not be right for me to score cheap points about that—

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Jane Kennedy): Tempting, but not right.

Mr. Crabb: Tempting, indeed.

The vast merged agency created by the merger of Revenue and Customs is a sprawling, cumbersome organisation that is beset with operational difficulties. The theoretical efficiency gains from the merger have become lost in a huge drive to slash the head count as part of the Government's wider efficiency drive to reduce civil service jobs. With tax credit problems, disastrous proposals for decimating the network of tax offices in Wales, lost computer records, and the crazy and bewildering increase in the number of internal UK flights taken by senior Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs managers, a picture is emerging of an organisation with serious problems, and our debate today about customs cover should be considered in that context.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon), who is Vice-Chairman of the Treasury Committee said yesterday that there have been "persistent rumours that all is not well at Revenue and Customs."

A senior member of HMRC told me privately last week that the Department is in a state of "utter shambles", and I understand that an internal survey this summer showed that just one in five HMRC staff was satisfied with the Department. The chairman of HMRC behaved honourably yesterday—that happens far too infrequently in public life—when he took responsibility for operational failures, but the problem also concerns policy.

I shall end with a series of questions, which I hope the Financial Secretary will be able to answer today, or in writing later if she does not have the information to hand or if there is not enough time. Are current arrangements for customs cover at Welsh ports adequate and effective? Is there any research showing that the erosion of permanent customs cover at Welsh ports has not led to an increase in the overall supply through those ports of illegal drugs or trafficked people? If she does not have such research, can she provide an assurance that processes are in place to review the effectiveness of the current arrangements in Wales in the light of those challenges? What assurance can she provide that the priorities of customs teams are not being distorted by centralised targets, and that the more difficult challenges of trafficking in drugs or humans are being addressed as seriously as matters such as tobacco smuggling? Will the new Border and Immigration Agency lead to an overall increase in resources specifically for detection and investigation at ports of entry in Wales, or are we merely rebranding the current customs mobile detection teams which, as the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mark Williams) said, rarely appear in Wales? With customs inspections at an all-time low in Wales, with access to cheap class A drugs on the streets never easier, and with fears of an increase in trafficked young women and girls, Welsh ports are at risk of becoming a soft touch for traffickers. Wales is a wide-open back door to the UK, and needs better security arrangements.

11.14 am

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Jane Kennedy): It is a great pleasure to be here this morning debating security at the Welsh border. I am grateful for that opportunity, because it allows me to put on record at the outset not only my experience of working with HMRC during the past four months, but my long experience of working with it in Northern Ireland. It performed a critical role, with other law enforcement agencies, in assisting us to bring the Northern Ireland organised criminal networks under serious and sustained attack to the extent that real progress was made, and continues to be made, in combating organised crime. The Chamber should understand the central role played by co-ordinated work with other agencies—including intelligence work and work with special branch and the police—in the success of HMRC in dealing with the threats that it faces and the complex range of tasks that we ask it to perform.

Albert Owen rose—

Jane Kennedy: My hon. Friend indicated that he would like to intervene, and although it is a short debate I shall give way to him on this occasion.

Albert Owen: I was hoping to contribute to the debate at greater length and in detail, but this is an intervention.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Mr. Crabb) for securing this debate. He claims that Wales could be a soft touch and a back door, but I do not accept either of those statements. First, it is a front door, because Holyhead is one of the busiest ports in the United Kingdom. It is also a major ferry port—the third largest in the United Kingdom and the largest on the western seaboard—with more than 2 million passengers a year.

Co-operation between the different agencies is an issue, and while the hon. Gentleman is right to say that drugs seizures by HMRC have fallen, police seizures have risen considerably, because they are compensating in a common travel area for much of HMRC's work.

Jane Kennedy: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point. The quality and nature of the work and the co-operation between different agencies obviously need to be kept under constant review, and that is taking place.

I noted the point made by the hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire about having to leave early. Rather than trying to wind up the debate early, I shall probably need the full time available, but I shall not take offence if the hon. Gentleman leaves, although I am not sure how you feel about that, Mr. Atkinson.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (in the Chair): Order. This debate continues until half past the hour, so the Financial Secretary has the Floor until then.

If the hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Mr. Crabb) runs, he will, taking Prayers into account, get there in time.

Jane Kennedy: I have talked about the challenges that HMRC faces, and the requirement constantly to review those challenges and to work in co-operation with other agencies. I will look up the point that my hon. Friend raised.

The hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire said that there was concern about the drop in the street price of drugs as a result of reduced numbers of seizures. I am sure that he will appreciate that there is no simple correlation between the two. The number of seizures and the street price are not directly related, and the matter is extremely complex.

Mr. Crabb: There is a correlation in the specific meaning of the word. I said that we should not just assume that correlation means causation. There is a range of factors, but the drop in the number of seizures, which are not fully compensated for by an increase in police seizures, is a contributory factor.

Jane Kennedy: That is a fair and valuable point, and we want to monitor that, but the matter is of equal concern because the organised criminal networks that traffic in drugs and people are the same. They simply turn their hand to whatever is the easiest commodity to traffic at the time. Seizures of cigarettes in 2004-05 and 2005-06 were 2.3 million and 2.7 million respectively, and seizures this year remain broadly in line with the two previous years. That evidence confirms that there is a continuing risk in Wales, but resources are being deployed appropriately and in line with the current threat.

I want now to make several more general points about the way in which HMRC is working before talking about the border agency, if I have time. I will, of course, undertake to write to the hon. Gentleman if I do not answer all the questions that he has raised.

About 7,000 HMRC staff are employed on activities that touch on the border, and the majority of detection staff—about 4,500—are deployed at ports, airports and inland. Such uniformed customs officers, who are familiar to us all at ports and airports, have to help with and support detection work, with their highly effective dogs, which can search out class A drugs, cash, animal products and tobacco.

HMRC has also invested heavily in new technology and has extensive state-of-the-art X-ray and scanning equipment, some of which is at Cardiff and much of which is mobile, being used at ports and airports throughout the UK. It also has a five-strong fleet of modern, world-class cutters and crews, who are continually active off the UK's more remote coastal locations, including the south-west approaches. The cutter fleet has a highly sophisticated monitoring capability and forms an integral part of HMRC's anti-smuggling strategy. It is a pleasure to be able to spell out some of the really good work that HMRC is doing. The whole organisation is saddened by the announcement that we have had to make and the events that led up to it, but it has some extremely professional and highly skilled people, who are doing a terrific job, and I pay tribute to them.

To meet the challenges that we have discussed and make more effective use of its resources, modern equipment and assets, HMRC has changed its tactics in recent years and become more intelligence-led and less predictable. It is critical that it does so, and that is an important change. Fixed teams of officers at every port and airport, who are engaged on routine, less productive duty patterns, are not the most efficient and effective way to tackle or deter today's organised, sophisticated and well-resourced criminal gangs, who are determined to breach the UK's border controls. Experience shows that flexible mobile teams allow Customs to deploy in larger numbers, less predictably and with greater impact to any area of the UK where intelligence identifies a risk, and I am sure that the hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire would want Customs to do so.

As a result of building a highly skilled, highly mobile and better equipped force and working more closely in partnership with the police, the Border and Immigration Agency and anti-terrorist agencies, HMRC is today better able to tackle modern-day criminals and others intent on breaching our border controls. Through its investment in intelligence, data acquisition, which is important in such work, and new information technology, HMRC is better placed to target criminals and disrupt their activities before they cause harm.

Albert Owen: When the new single agency is up and running, it will encompass UKvisas. That is not applicable to the Welsh ports, because they are a common travel area, but it is applicable to bringing together immigration and Customs. However, I am still concerned that there needs to be a proper framework, including liaison with the police. At present, the work that we are discussing draws on territorial police, and local resources are used for port security. All that comes out of the central budget. Could that be looked at in the future?

Jane Kennedy: That will obviously be part of the thinking that goes into developing the new border agency. It is clear that the police will not be part of that agency, so the discussion that my hon. Friend describes will have to be taken forward. However, the border agency has been set up precisely with the objective of strengthening UK borders, and a significant majority—hon. Gentlemen may wish to hear this—of the detection staff based in Wales are likely to transfer to it. The combined detection skills of the BIA, as it is called at the moment, and UKvisas will strengthen the UK border. The new agency will have a combined work force of about 25,000 staff. We envisage that it will be able to join up the powers and skills of HMRC and the BIA, giving us even greater expertise in controlling the borders in Wales.

Let me put things into perspective and spend a minute or two talking about what happens at present. Current intelligence continues to indicate that the flow of illicit goods into the UK, such as counterfeit tobacco and class A drugs, will not come through small ports or airports, contrary to the fears of the hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire, although these things obviously need to be kept under close watch. Current intelligence indicates that they enter through the major ports and airports, which are principally in the south and east of England, and that they use commercial modes of transport. That view is supported by local operational intelligence, which indicates that the M4 corridor and west midlands are used to get supplies of illicit tobacco into Wales. That means that HMRC can best protect the communities of Wales from the threat posed by such commodities by tackling this major flow at the point where it enters the UK. Of course, basing Customs resources solely in major ports and airports cannot be the full answer, but if there is a perception that that is where the work is intensifying, that is for very sound operational purposes.

Mr. Crabb: If there is virtually no full-time uniformed Customs presence at the Welsh ports, who is gathering the evidence to suggest that they are not a major point of entry for the illegal products that we are discussing?

Jane Kennedy: HMRC not only has its own means of gathering intelligence, but co-operates, as I said, with other law enforcement agencies. It draws on and pools intelligence, which is an absolutely necessary prerequisite for successful team working. That is the way forward, and the lesson that we are learning around the world is that the greater the co-ordination and co-operation, the more effective the different agencies involved. However, I take the point that HMRC needs to remain alert and responsive.

I have talked about HMRC's investment in intelligence, and given the co-operation of shipping companies and airlines, HMRC today has a comprehensive and up-to-date picture of all freight and passenger movements through Welsh ports and airports. I hope that that provides some reassurance to those Members who have participated in the debate.

That intelligence picture enables HMRC to deploy to best effect the 59 front-line detection staff based in Wales. They are not based statically at ports—that would be a weakness—but in different, flexible ways, which is more appropriate to the risks that we face. If necessary, teams are sometimes mobile and sometimes draw on teams based in the west midlands, as well as the national strike force and the cutter fleet.

Specific intelligence-led operations periodically draw on other national resources. For example, in May and June this year, Operation Faun involved more than 50 officers from across the UK, including specialist cash detection teams from London and Gatwick, who worked with Welsh colleagues at Holyhead, Fishguard and Pembroke ports to test the risk of criminal cash being smuggled through those ports.

HMRC has changed its tactics, and its intelligence-led, risk-based and less predictable approach has proved successful. The facts speak for themselves: Treasury statistics indicate that the illicit market in cigarettes, which was 20 per cent. and rising in 2002, has been driven down to about 13 per cent. However, HMRC is not complacent. It is intelligence-led and will continually adjust its response to the changing threat. Through its professionalism, flexibility and unpredictability, it aims to continue to provide a good level of protection for the UK's border.

Barnett Formula

2.30 pm

Graham Stringer (Manchester, Blackley) (Lab): I am pleased to see so many Members present. I realise that some would prefer the debate not to take place, but I do not think that any area of public policy, particularly those relating to expenditure, should not be open for the debate in the House.

I first became acutely aware of how sensitive the subject was when I tabled early-day motion 402 in the last Session. Essentially, it said that the House was worried that support for the Union between England and Scotland was falling, as was seen in an opinion poll of the time, and, potentially, one of the causes of that was the Barnett formula, which should therefore be reviewed. That remains my position: I am in favour of the Union between England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, but I believe that the United Kingdom would be stronger if the distribution of public money was seen to be carried out in a fair and equitable manner.

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab) rose—

Graham Stringer: I shall give way on that point. I am aware that many people would like to speak, and I like to give way, but I do not want to do so too often.

Chris Ruane: If the Barnett formula was reviewed and if Scotland and Wales ended up with less money, does my hon. Friend believe that that would weaken or strengthen the Union?

Graham Stringer: I am not attacking Northern Ireland, Wales or Scotland. I wish to see public expenditure, which is directed on a per capita basis towards a person in Glasgow, Cardiff or Belfast when it comes to health or education, determined on the same basis in all four home countries.

Having tabled early-day motion 402, I found out that an official from No. 10 Downing street was going round to signatories and, without telling me, was asking them to withdraw their names from the motion because of the sensitivity of the issue. That was a profoundly wrong way for No. 10 officials to behave; such issues are better aired in public debate.

The Prime Minister has said on a number of occasions that he does not believe in a review, but I hope that we can change his mind. I listened carefully to his answer to the question on the Barnett formula today, and I am not sure in what sense he meant that the formula applied to England. It was based either on an obtuse understanding of the Barnett formula or he missed the point. Effectively, the formula applies at the margin and is based on an increase in expenditure in England, not previous expenditure, which is multiplied by a comparability factor of the population. I do not see what the Prime Minister meant when he said that the formula applies to England, apart from the fact that the calculation starts with England. My hon. Friend the Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Campbell), who asked the question, pointed out, as I shall, that the English regions end up disadvantaged because of how the money is allocated.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury said, as the Prime Minister had, that there would be no review. However, Wendy Alexander MSP and leader of the Labour party in Scotland—

Stewart Hosie (Dundee, East) (SNP): No she is not.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, South-West) (Lab/Co-op) rose—

Graham Stringer: I shall give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Davidson: May I advise hon. Members that Wendy Alexander is the leader of the Labour party in the Scottish Parliament? The Labour leader in Scotland, as in the United Kingdom, is my right hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy and Cowdenbeath (Mr. Brown).

Graham Stringer: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for clarifying that, but we were talking about the same person. In The Daily Telegraph on 12 September, Wendy Alexander said that the time might now be right for a review of the formula.

It is excellent to be able to talk to the person who is potentially the greatest living source on the Barnett formula—my noble Friend Lord Barnett. I shared a taxi with him on Monday, and he is clear that the Barnett formula has lasted for much longer than he intended. He is looking to set up an ad hoc Lords Select Committee to examine how money should be distributed between the four home countries, so the debate will continue. That is unfortunate for those who do not like the debate, but it is healthy to have it.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): There is actually a large constituency of support for review of the formula, but does the hon. Gentleman recognise that those of us from Wales assume that any kind of needs-based formula would increase rather than reduce the amount given to Wales?

Graham Stringer: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point—I was going to come to it.

Any distribution of public money should be based on equity and fairness, and it should be transparent. Preferably, given the relationship between the four countries, it should have a legislative basis, so everybody knows where they stand. The Barnett formula does not have such a basis.

It is known and recognised, even at street level, that the formula is unfair to the English regions. It is less well known, as the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) said, that if we were to apply the normal fiscal needs basis to Wales—it might include distribution of population, road length, crime, unemployment, substandard housing and health issues, and the things that are considered in most needs-based formulas—Wales would require more money than Scotland. In actual fact, Wales gets nearly £500 a head less. It is often thought that reviewing the Barnett formula is a matter for the English regions only. It is a matter for the regions, but not exclusively; a review would look for a fairer basis on which to spend money within the United Kingdom.

The debate is about the Barnett formula and I do not wish to get dragged into constitutional conundrums—at least not much—but there are constitutional issues that relate to the formula. People in the English regions feel that they suffer a double whammy: first, they do not get the same level of funding and, secondly, they have less immediate local control over many of the services that the Welsh Assembly and Scottish Parliament control away from Westminster.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North and Sefton, East) (Lab): My hon. Friend knows that I share much of his analysis of the situation. However, is it not really a triple whammy, because there are huge disparities between English regions, which strengthens the force of his argument?

Graham Stringer: Hon. Members on both sides of the House appear to have had sight of my speech even though I was still writing it half an hour ago. I am coming to my right hon. Friend's point, but I shall first go through some of the issues that illustrate the unfairness. I could spend the rest of the debate going through the figures, some of which are in the Library debate pack and the Library guide to the formula, but I shall not go through them all.

Last year, disposable household income in Scotland was £11,753, which is £1,000 greater than in the north-east of England. However, when it comes to public expenditure, the north-east of England receives £600 less per capita than Scotland, and the north-west of England receives £800 less per capita. Overall in England, the per capita level of expenditure is £1,000 less.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): Just for the record and the sake of correctness, will the hon. Gentleman confirm that he is talking about identifiable public expenditure? He is talking not about total public expenditure, but about identifiable public expenditure.

Graham Stringer: I accept the hon. Gentleman's point. The reason why I do not want to go through a lot of similar statistics is that they do not illustrate as well as real examples why in many English regions and certainly in Manchester, people do not talk about the Barnett formula, but they do now talk about its impact. I shall give the best illustration that I can. It has not been a happy week for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but unfortunately I will have to use him as an example.

When the Crossrail project was agreed, the Chancellor issued a press release that said that Scotland would benefit indirectly from the £16 billion Crossrail project in London. That is not happening on any basis of need and it is particularly annoying for people in Leeds, Manchester and Liverpool, because when the Chancellor was Secretary of State for Transport, he cancelled either tram extensions or trams in those cities. If we work out the so-called Barnett consequentials of that £16 billion—I do not think that they have been made publicly available yet; I have just tabled a parliamentary question to quantify them as exactly as possible—we see that that would have bought at least one tram set for Leeds or Liverpool and possibly two.

We are talking about a Scottish Secretary of State for Transport who cancelled tram systems in England even though he could not affect the debate on whether trams were on the streets of his own city of Edinburgh. Now, when he is Chancellor and there is huge public expenditure on a London project, he boasts that it will benefit Scotland. As my children say, is that really fair?

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman take the view that others might think that that situation should disbar any Scottish MP in this place from being Secretary of State for Transport, the Home Secretary, the Secretary of State for Health or the Secretary of State for Education? I should be interested to know the hon. Gentleman's views and those of his colleagues.

Graham Stringer: No, I absolutely do not take that view. Not for the first time is a Conservative party proposal unworkable. It does not deal with the real issue, which is that the situation of people living in Leeds or Birmingham, in terms of their influence on local policies on health and transport, is very similar to that of people in Scotland. Rather than creating a completely unworkable situation in the House of Commons in which there are different classes of Members, it would be better to devolve issues down to local democracy. I do not accept the point that the hon. Gentleman makes.

The example that I have given illustrates the fact that the English regions are not just competing with London, Scotland, Wales or Northern Ireland for resources, but are left out of the complete calculation. That is why, when I walk down the streets in Manchester, although people do not say that the Barnett formula is wrong, they do come up to me and say, "Why does my daughter have to pay tuition fees in England, whereas if we lived in Scotland, she wouldn't?" They go through a series of issues—hon. Members will be aware of them—from being able to get cancer drugs in Scotland that are not available elsewhere, to the care of the elderly—[Interruption.] I hear hon. Members saying from a sedentary position that that is to do with the Scottish Parliament, but the fact is that the Scottish Parliament, without raising a penny in taxes, can spend money at a higher rate than is the case in England. The whole basis of this debate is to ask for a review so that there is an equitable basis for funding.

I am part of a campaign, with a number of hon. Members from all parties, to try to secure a referendum on the Lisbon treaty or reform treaty or whatever the European constitution is called at the moment. The basis of that is trust: what people say to the electorate should be carried through. What is often not talked about is that in national elections, there is a corrosive effect, certainly within the three major parties, in terms of how they campaign at national level and in the different countries.

I have searched through the manifestos of the Conservative party, the Lib Dems and the Labour party, and there is no mention in the last three manifestos of all those parties for the United Kingdom—in the Great Britain manifestos, to be precise—of the Barnett formula, with one exception. In 2001, the Lib Dems came out against the Barnett formula and were in favour of a review and a fairer basis for funding.

[Graham Stringer]

Lembit Öpik: I have two points. The variations in policy cannot all be ascribed to the Barnett formula; there are political distinctions to be made there. However, the most important point is that the hon. Gentleman should accept that the Liberal Democrats have been campaigning for a change in the Barnett formula—for slightly different reasons from the ones that he is giving—for many years. Indeed, we made that a key point in the 2005 general election in Wales and in the most recent Assembly elections, because we think that a needs-based formula, which I think he is calling for as well, is absolutely the right way to go. Even Joel Barnett, who invented the formula, seems to agree that the current formula is bankrupt.

Graham Stringer: I take the hon. Gentleman's point. Of course, the nature of devolution is that there will be policies at elections in Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland that relate to those countries, but where there are issues of taxation and expenditure, there is no doubt that the Barnett formula applies to England and has consequences in England. It is very strange, unhealthy and corrosive that it was possible for the previous Prime Minister to go to the Lighthouse in Glasgow on 13 April and say what a great thing the Barnett formula was, whereas it was not mentioned in our 2005 manifesto. That is the real point I am making. There is a level of unintended dishonesty, in that the Conservative party, the Lib Dem party and the Labour party would not campaign hard on what a great thing the Barnett formula is in England, and that needs exposing.

Chris Ruane: I thank my hon. Friend for being so generous in giving way. He perceives that there is an injustice, an inequality, in funding between various countries of the UK.

Mr. George Howarth: And regions.

Chris Ruane: Indeed. Has my hon. Friend also considered the unequal way in which the defence budget is divided up around the UK? I tabled a parliamentary question seven or eight years ago for per capita figures, and it turned out that the north-east did well; Wales did not do too well; and the south-west did well. These issues need to be considered in the round.

Graham Stringer: The way in which parts of the Government's expenditure are allocated around the country is clearly worthy of debate. I know that all hon. Members fight very hard for their constituencies and I accept the point that sometimes too much goes to one area rather than to another. I wanted to initiate a debate and keep it going about how one aspect of how spatial public expenditure is allocated seems to be fundamentally unfair.

Mr. Davidson: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Graham Stringer: I will, but for the last time. I want to give other hon. Members time to speak.

Mr. Davidson: My hon. Friend is a fine fellow, particularly in his views on the European constitution. However, does he agree that it is important to ensure that any review of spatial expenditure does not focus on the Barnett formula alone? Also, we need a review of expenditure not only within England—I completely accept that we need one here—but in Scotland. It is clear that my area of Glasgow is grossly underfunded in comparison with many other parts of the country, which receive far greater public expenditure although they have far less need.

Graham Stringer: I am sure that my hon. Friend will accept that there are great similarities between post-industrial cities such as Glasgow, Manchester and Leeds in terms of deprivation, health problems and having double the usual level of unemployment. One can go through the statistics. Glasgow, Leeds, Birmingham, Manchester and the other industrial cities should be dealt with similarly—I accept that—but one of those cities should not be dealt with better just because it is north of the border.

I am asking for a review for equity. I understand what some hon. Members are asking: will it mean less for Wales or Scotland? Not necessarily, because time could be taken to make things fairer—one comes to rates of increase when talking about such matters. But if we do not change things, we are accepting that the English regions—I gave what I think is the best illustration, transport policy—will be permanently disadvantaged. I know that some hon. Members in this Chamber, although I am not one of them, believe that it would be a good thing if the English regions were disadvantaged, because it would add to the arguments against the Union. I want the review because I am strongly in favour of keeping the countries in the United Kingdom together.

This debate has not been primarily about the constitution, but about how, rather than the Conservative solution to what is clearly an unfairness, decisions should be taken at a different level in Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland. I do not think that the House of Commons should be divided into Members of different status, but I think that a serious look should be taken at how local democracy can be given back many of the powers and resources to make decisions that only 50 years ago, within living memory, were taken by county councils and major cities.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Peter Atkinson (in the Chair): Order. May I say to hon. Members present that I intend to call the wind-ups at half-past 3? Seven Members have indicated in advance that they wish to speak. If I am to get them all in, they will have to speak for approximately five or six minutes each. I ask Members to bear that in mind as it will make the debate fairer for everybody.

2.53 pm

Mr. Dai Davies (Blaenau Gwent) (Ind): I thank the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) for bringing this debate into the open. It has been hidden for too long. I speak on behalf of a borough that is regularly listed among the 10 most deprived areas in Britain and has been so for a long time. The needs-based formula must be debated; it is no good hiding from it. The Welsh Assembly Government recently voted that that should happen, and we should take our lead from them.

In Blaenau Gwent, one of the poorest boroughs, we also have one of the highest rates of council tax in Wales, if not the highest. Once a borough is poor, it is extremely difficult to escape from that position. Settlements come down from either London or the Cardiff Government, but our uplift is also among the lowest in Wales. The spiral of deprivation, in which a borough continues to be poor, is difficult to escape. A needs-based formula might have to be based in part on population, but to hide from the debate is not the answer.

The Government introduced European objective 1 funding, which was seen as a means of lifting people out of poverty. The problem is that it cannot be used for statutory responsibility, so the funding does not help to lift boroughs out of their real problem, which is statutory funding and statutory responsibility. European funding is also project-based, not long-term, and that is another worry—it can disappear as quickly as it is given. It is important that we consider the needs of every area and region in this country, and not in isolation.

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab): If a review goes ahead and Wales gets less money under a revised Barnett formula, does the hon. Gentleman think that Blaenau Gwent will get more money or less?

Mr. Dai Davies: The feeling in Blaenau Gwent is that we could not be any worse off. In our opinion the review, if it is based on need, can mean only that we will be better off. As we are in the bottom 10, the only way is up; in that respect, we have nothing to lose. Whatever the outcome, a review must be held. It must be open and honest, and everyone must have an input. I urge all hon. Members to push for that, because the fair distribution of moneys throughout this country is vital to areas such as mine. European funding is under threat again. Convergence funding could be taken away in one or two years' time. We are still left with no definite funding. I urge everyone to support the call for a review.

2.57 pm

Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): I think that I secured the last debate on the Barnett formula, in 2001. I called for a cross-party group from the House of Lords and the House of Commons to review the formula and said that whatever its conclusions, it should start from the premise that it would take 10 years to implement the changes. I stand by that.

Three issues concern me. One is that only three regions in the United Kingdom actually have a positive GDP—the east of England, London and the south-east. Why is that? Why are the others negative after so much investment since the second world war? Is it something fundamentally wrong with the structure in our regions that makes them negative? Secondly, the formula is clearly a concern. I detect distinct nervousness in this Room in Welsh, Scottish and Northern Irish Members, and I can understand that. Thirdly, to say that there is no constitutional implication is foolish. There will be constitutional implications.

I suggest to the House—I hope that the Minister will take this seriously—that we are in government together. Our constituents are concerned about the Barnett formula. I should like to see a Joint Committee of the House of Lords and the House of Commons, and I should like it to have three purposes. One is to understand better why only three regions of the United Kingdom make any money for us. I propose that the reason is the university structure and the number of patents that are exploited. Without considering that, we will not get underneath the issue. The second purpose is to consider the funding formula, and the third the constitutional implications. A Joint Committee of both Houses, challenged to consider those three things, would come back with the most profound findings about what we must do to be a modern 21st-century country.

2.59 pm

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) on securing this important debate. The issue has been fraught with significant controversy since 1978, when the Barnett formula was introduced, although preferential funding treatment for Scotland goes back to the end of the Victorian era and Lord Goschen. The problem became particularly strong in the aftermath of devolution, during the past eight years. However, it seems that the public at large often labour under a number of misapprehensions. [Interruption.] We all know what game the Scottish nationalists are playing. They want the whole thing shaken up; they would love nothing more than an aggressive cut in the Barnett formula, as it would allow them to play to the gallery at home. We are not going to play that game, and I hope that the same applies to Labour Members.

There is a perception that the Barnett formula is set in stone, but it is a convention that could be changed at will by the Treasury. There is also a sense that England gets an unfair deal, and that applies not only to the English regions, but in my part of London. I accept that it gets a fair amount of public expenditure. Indeed, the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley referred to the protected £16 billion being invested in Crossrail, but as the hon. Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Derek Wyatt) rightly pointed out, London is still a net donor.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): When identified spending is factored into the equation, London secures more money than Scotland. What does the hon. Gentleman have to say about that? I do not ask him to accept it, but he should at least conclude that a debate is to be had about it.

Mr. Field: We could doubtless debate statistics at both ends of the argument, but there was a tacit acceptance of the Barnett formula by the Conservative Administration between 1979 and 1997, who relied on only a small minority of votes and seats in Scotland. That is one reason why it was maintained. I disagree with the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley. My view is that after 1997, and particularly after devolution in 1999, it ceased to be a question of economics. It is now a matter of raw constitutional politics.

The formula fails to provide for the proper fiscal independence of the devolved Governments in Scotland and Wales. Even with its own Parliament, Scotland has to work within a total sum over which it has absolutely no control, although it does have some discretion. That is unacceptable. I have always been more relaxed than many of my party colleagues and many people across England about the effects of devolution. I believe that localism should be properly respected. One of the interesting things about my constituency—the seven square miles of central London that I represent—is that it is actively cosmopolitan.

Mr. David Hamilton (Midlothian) (Lab): It is rich.

Mr. Field: Of course, it has pockets of great wealth. It also has pockets of great poverty. I would happily go with the hon. Gentleman to literally within 200 yd of here, down to Abbey Orchard estate, and to Pimlico and Bayswater. It is much more mixed. The point is that even in the midst of a cosmopolitan constituency, there is a great passion for localism—for the idea of local residents associations and amenity societies. One of the big challenges of politics is trying to marry the fact that although we live in a global economy and a globalised world, it is one where local issues matter.

However, the postcode lottery was implicit in what the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley said. Scotland, of course, has preferential treatment for university fees, for the long-term care of the elderly, and more recently for prescription charges. I congratulate the right hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) on his clever political role on prescription charges, because the postcode lottery has a particular effect in relation to the health service. The nationalised health service is one subject that most people in the United Kingdom feel strongly about, and more so than about the postcode lottery or other elements of expenditure.

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman is right about the policies of the Scottish National party, including the reduction in primary school class sizes, the cancellation of student debts, the hiring of 1,000 new police officers and free prescriptions. The only difference is that they have not been delivered—neither are they likely to be delivered—and they will blame us for it if they are not.

Mr. Field: I shall not get into such localised debates, but the hon. Gentleman has put his concerns on the record. The move by the Scottish National party's Administration at Holyrood to drive a new wedge into the area of health spending is clever politics, for it stokes up resentment on the subject that is of most concern in relation to the postcode lottery. It is a trap into which those who truly support the Union should not fall.

I have to say that my party's view that we should support English votes for English laws is unworkable. It is absurd that we should have to go through a health Bill, saying that clause 13(7) can be voted on only by English Members but that clause 13(8) can be voted on by all Members. That is nonsense. Nor do I support the notion of an English Grand Committee. It will allow those who wish to do so to suggest that we are somehow trying to put the Union at risk. However, we must have transparency in matters financial. I hope that we will be galvanised by considering all the facts.

At least since devolution, I have preferred the idea of having an English Parliament with exactly the same rights as the Scottish Parliament. I am the only Conservative Member who voted in favour of getting rid of the House of Lords. I would have the Lords as a UK Parliament, with a unicameral system, and have English, Welsh, Scottish and Northern Ireland Parliaments with exactly the same powers, but allowing foreign affairs, defence and a certain amount of fiscal policy to be made by a UK Parliament.

We shall surely return to these matters many times. Make no mistake, however, that any move to recalibrate the Barnett formula would have political and, above all, constitutional implications well beyond the merely financial and fiscal elements that make up what is to many a somewhat mischievous mechanism.

3.6 pm

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) on securing the debate. At least for its duration we will set aside the war of the roses. I thank my many colleagues and friends from Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales for supporting us in this debate.

I strongly support the Union. We will continue to have greater international influence as a United Kingdom than if we Balkanise Britain into a number of smaller states. However, I believe that the Union is challenged on three fronts. First, and openly, it is challenged by Scotland's First Minister, whose target is independence. Secondly, it is challenged indirectly by a groundswell of English resentment, because we in England pay the same taxes as those in others part of the United Kingdom but get a smaller share of public expenditure per person. As a consequence we in England pay for some public services—residential care, prescriptions, university student fees—that cost less or are free in others parts of the United Kingdom.

Thirdly, the Union is challenged indirectly—I will be kind and say unintentionally—by the Conservative-led clamour for English votes for English laws. The idea that Members of the House of Commons should be divided into two categories—those from England with rights to vote on all matters, and those from Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland who are treated as second-class MPs without full voting rights—would be a serious blow to the concept of the Union.

Mr. Davidson: Would it not be even more complicated than that? It would not be English Members and everyone else. The Scots would be able to vote on some things; the Welsh would be able to vote on different things; the Northern Irish would be able to vote on some things that the English did not vote on but which the Welsh may have done; and within England there would be some things that the London Members could not vote upon that other English Members could. There would be six categories of Members. Perhaps I can also ask my hon. Friend whether he supports the idea of "one Lord, one lamp post" when reforming the House of Lords.

Hugh Bayley: I strongly agree with my hon. Friend's earlier remarks.

The biggest difficulty would be to determine which issues can be voted on by each of the many electoral factions that would be produced by the Conservative proposal. More seriously, it would be an attack on the British tradition of Cabinet government. Under our system, the leader of a majority party in the House of Commons appoints a Cabinet, which is bound by collective responsibility and which remains in office while it retains the support and confidence of a majority of our House. The proposition for English votes for English laws would, in the words of Peter Riddell, writing in The Times earlier this month, "destroy the coherence" of Cabinet government.

The Barnett formula was created in the mid-1970s as a short-term fix, to prevent the annual feuding between the Treasury and the three territorial Secretaries of State. It may have made sense then, but it is no longer appropriate. As we heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley, it has been disowned by Joel Barnett himself. It has also been disowned by Lord Sewell, the Scottish Office Minister who took the Scotland Act 1998 through Parliament. Writing in a Smith Institute pamphlet recently, he said:

"Barnett served the UK well prior to devolution and was important in enabling a smooth transition to be made to devolved government...It has now outlived its usefulness."

I first became aware of the difficulties and inappropriateness of the Barnett formula in the winter of 1997-98, when I was the Parliamentary Private Secretary to my right hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson), who was then the Secretary of State for Health. The incoming Labour Government were determined to avoid the winter pressures—the winter beds crisis—that we had witnessed in the previous few winters under the Conservatives. As hon. Members will remember, we were tied to the John Major Government's spending plans for our first two years in government, but my right hon. Friend managed to negotiate an additional £269 million for England to avoid a winter beds crisis in that first winter under the Labour Government. There was no prospect of a beds crisis in Scotland, Wales or Northern Ireland, because they had had none previously and had the resources to avoid one that winter. Nevertheless, they received £17 million, £10 million and £18 million respectively in additional health expenditure under the Barnett formula. Just recently, the Prime Minister announced £16 billion for the Crossrail project in London, but that will deliver another £500 million of expenditure for Scotland. That is not an efficient use of public money.

The consequence of Barnett 30 years on is that people living in Yorkshire receive £1,400 less per year on average than people living in Scotland. However, the percentage of people living in poverty is greater in Yorkshire than in Scotland, at 22 per cent., as opposed to 20 per cent., according to the latest households below average income survey. In 2005—the latest year for which we have figures—gross disposal income per head was also lower in Yorkshire than in Scotland, at £12,200 per head, as opposed to £12,600.

Jim Sheridan: On deprivation, my hon. Friend will also be aware that seven of our 10 most deprived areas are in Scotland.

Hugh Bayley: I accept that there is poverty in Scotland and that there are additional costs from rurality in the highlands of Scotland, but there is also poverty in Yorkshire and the Humber, and there is rurality in my part of North Yorkshire.

We should use the same criteria to assess need and the same basis for apportioning public expenditure in all parts of the United Kingdom; if we do not, we will undermine the basis of the Union. I therefore support the proposal by my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley that there should be a transparent needs-based review of the Barnett formula.

3.12 pm

Adam Price (Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr) (PC): I congratulate the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) on raising this vital issue and on the careful and measured way in which he developed his case. There is a growing consensus that we need a review of the way in which we raise and distribute resources in these islands, and that consensus embraces the nationalist parties in the three nations, some of the Unionist parties and the Alliance party in Northern Ireland, dissident Labour MPs, MSPs and AMs and the Liberal Democrats, although we are not quite sure about the Conservatives.

The hon. Gentleman put his finger on why there is a consensus about the fact that it is high time for a review: Barnett is a headcount formula, and injustice was almost written into it from the very start because it did not take need into consideration. Nuffield college, for example, has estimated that the absence of a needs-based formula may have led to a shortfall of £1 billion in Wales. The last time the Treasury conducted the needs-based assessment across the UK for which the hon. Gentleman is calling was 1976, and it is surely high time, after 30 years, for it to conduct a review. We do, however, have one needs-based formula in the UK: the Big Lottery Fund. Using a semi-official needs-based formula, it allocates 6.5 per cent. of the fund to Wales, rather than the 4. 9 per cent. that we get under Barnett.

The injustice is, however, getting worse, because Barnett is a convergent formula over time. In 2000, for example, Wales was 9 per cent. above the UK average for health expenditure per head, with a figure of 109 per cent., but we are now down to 104 per cent., and the figure is falling further, even though we have a similar sickness profile to the north-east of England. The north-east rightly deserves more money because of the legacy of heavy industry, but it has now overtaken Wales, and we currently have no mechanism to reflect the chronic ill health in our community.

The hon. Gentleman was right to raise this issue for another reason. One of the problems with the Barnett formula is that it is not statutory, so there is a lack of consistency and transparency about the way in which it is applied. We saw an example of that in the comprehensive spending review when the Treasury implemented a change in the baseline for the English Departments. As a result of money not being spent and the baseline being shifted—jiggery-pokery, effectively—Wales lost £260 million. What Barnett giveth, Barnett can apparently take away, and we saw such a reverse Barnett formula applied in the comprehensive spending review.

The other problem is what is and is not included in calculating the Barnett formula. I have with me the statement of funding policy—the bible of the Barnett formula—which is published every three years. It makes curious reading, because a number of things are excluded from the formula as a result of being categorised as benefiting the UK as a whole. That is fair enough, but such things are often principally for the benefit of England and, in many cases, one part of it—the south-east.

For example, the Government have spent £552 million on the channel tunnel rail link this year alone, but that is excluded from the Barnett formula. When the Conservative Government made the original decision to build the channel tunnel back in the 1980s, high-speed one would come into London, and high-speed two and three would go into Wales and the west of England and link up the north of England and Scotland. That was fair enough, because it was a UK project, and we would all benefit, with connections across the UK and to the European mainland. Then, however, high-speed two and three, which would have connected the rest of the UK, were cancelled, so the high-speed rail link now begins and ends in London and we are no longer talking about a UK project. None the less, it is excluded from the Barnett formula.

There are other examples. Some £29 million was spent on the botanic gardens at Kew, but there was not a penny in a Barnett consequential for the national botanic garden in Wales, which is in my constituency, so I should declare an interest. Nor does the royal botanic garden in Edinburgh get a penny, although I seem to remember that it predates not only the Barnett formula, but the botanic gardens in Kew—it was actually created first.

There are loads of these anomalies. Some £17 million has been spent on cycling, but we do not get anything, even though I seem to recall that we do actually ride bikes in Wales and Scotland. There is also £72 million for sustainability and renewable energy, which are big issues in Wales and Scotland, but not a penny comes to us. The list goes on and on.

Then there are the negative Barnett consequentials, which take money away. For some reason, for every pound that the Government receive from the Dartford toll crossings, 11p is taken from the Scottish public services block and 6p from the Welsh one. Can anyone explain why the Government's receipts from the Dartford toll crossings have anything to do with the level of expenditure that we should have on public services in Wales and Scotland?

There is also the issue of prescription charges. Income from prescription charges is included as a negative in the Barnett formula. Some £450 million is raised in prescription charges in England, but Wales and Scotland take a hit for every pound that is handed over in prescription charges. There are therefore all kinds of anomalies in the way in which the formula currently operates.

There are also some quirky things in there. Some £90 million is spent on nuclear non-proliferation and subscription to international organisations. Low and behold, the National Assembly for Wales and the Scottish Parliament get a 100 per cent. consequential on that. When Scotland's First Minister wrote to the 178 embassies and consulates asking for observer status for Scotland on the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, he was attacked by the Scotland Office, which said that that was outside the competence of the Scottish Parliament. It should have had a word with the Treasury, because apparently that matter is part of the responsibility of the Scottish Parliament and the National Assembly.

The Barnett formula is anomalous; it is an anachronism; it is unfair; and it lacks transparency. That is the case across these islands, including for the English regions, such as the south-west, that suffer from it. It is not fit for the era of democratic devolution. We are being treated as branch offices of Whitehall. What of the language that is used—"consequentials"? Decisions are made about English expenditure, which then bind our democratic institutions in Wales and Scotland. That is no way to reflect the era of democratic devolution. We need real accountability. We need a needs-based formula and, yes, we need elements of fiscal federalism as well.

To conclude, I want to ask the Minister whether the Treasury will commit itself to co-operating fully with the first official review of the Barnett formula since it was created, which was announced by the Labour-Plaid Cymru "One Wales" Government, so that we can finally get clarity on the issue, and a clear picture of who, if anyone, gains from the formula and who, including Wales, loses.

3.20 pm

John Robertson (Glasgow, North-West) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) on securing the debate. I sometimes wonder, when the Barnett formula is mentioned, where I should be coming from, but I think of the old "Carry On" film with Kenneth Williams, when he came out with the line, "Infamy! Infamy! They've all got it in for me!" That would apply to every hon. Member who has spoken in the debate. They have all told us that they live in the poorest area of the world or the universe, that they are hard up and that Scots people are well off. Yet by my figures six of the poorest constituencies in the United Kingdom are in Glasgow. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, South-West (Mr. Davidson) represents one of the poorest areas in the United Kingdom. Yet we are told that everyone else's constituency is just as poor as ours, or worse off. My hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Clwyd (Chris Ruane) mentioned the uneven circulation of money allocated by the Ministry of Defence. Some areas benefit much more than others, including in Scotland and Wales, yet when we talk about the Barnett formula we want to argue about who is the poorest, who is the richest, and who gets money for what.

The agreements were arrived at for a reason. I do not want to give everyone a history lesson, but perhaps I may explain exactly how the Barnett formula came about. The Barnett formula followed on from another formula, which was put in place in 1888, called the Goschen formula. It was based on population, which is why the Barnett formula took a similar approach. Other national characteristics were also taken into consideration. The figures for Scotland traditionally gave a higher level of spending. Why? Scotland contains a third of the British land mass, with isolated islands and rural communities. More than 60 per cent. of the UK coastline is in Scotland. Of the 10 areas with the worst life expectancy in the UK, seven are in Scotland, and six of those are in Glasgow. I have great respect for the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field), and have spoken in many previous debates with him on many Bills, and I apologise for the time when I said that everyone who worked in the City was a crook—it is probably only half of them. But when he speaks of being able to show us poverty only a few hundred yards from here my reply is that I will take him to Glasgow and show him real poverty. We can compare things and see who has it worst.

We appear to have an unholy alliance—[Interruption.] It is disappointing.

Mr. Angus MacNeil (Na h-Eileanan an Iar) (SNP): Would the hon. Gentleman say that about the Irish nationalists?

John Robertson: The hon. Gentleman is saying things from a sedentary position, but I would just remind him of the saying about people in glass houses.

My hon. Friend the Member for Paisley and Renfrewshire, North (Jim Sheridan) made a good point. I do not remember a Labour Government, months into their tenure, being called liars and cheats, and being accused of hoodwinking people to win an election, as has happened with the Scottish National party. I do not remember any party getting that kind of treatment only a few months into its tenure. Promises are promises; we do our best and try to work to them. Obviously, that applies only to certain parties in this House, and I am glad to say that mine is one.

Mr. MacNeil: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

John Robertson: Certainly. I cannot wait.

Mr. MacNeil: Would the hon. Gentleman care to remind us what the 2003 Labour party manifesto said about council tax rebanding? Did it happen?

John Robertson: The hon. Gentleman has obviously caught me at a loss. He may carry the Labour party manifesto about; good luck to him. He obviously gets a lot of knowledge from it. I do not carry every one of our manifestos around, but I do know whom I represent, what a lie is, and what the truth is. I shall stand up for that. Unfortunately, it appears that his party, north of the border, cannot do that these days. [Interruption.] I hear from a sedentary position that this is scandalous. I am sure that if I were doing anything scandalous you would tell me to sit down, Mr. Atkinson. If I were telling a lie I am sure that the Scottish National party would want to take me to court.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (in the Chair): Order. I was about to get to my feet to remind the hon. Gentleman that we are debating the Barnett formula.

John Robertson: Thank you, Mr. Atkinson; that is what I am talking about. The Barnett formula was an agreement made between Parliaments down here. When I make an agreement with someone I like to stick to it. If we had stuck to it, and merging had taken place over time as was supposed to happen with the Barnett formula, we would not be having this discussion. However, the Conservative party—whose spokesman will unfortunately speak later—let go of the formula from 1979 to 1992 without doing anything about it. If merging had occurred as was supposed to happen, the Barnett formula might have converged by now, or at least we might be contemplating that in the near future. Once again, a political party unfortunately did not do what it was supposed to. It wanted votes north of the border. Well, it got the votes it deserved, with two Members in the last three general elections. That says it all.

As a trade unionist, which I have been all my working life, I have been expected, by the members whom I have always looked after and supported, to deliver as I have said I would. Those expectations extend to the Barnett formula. The fact is that Scotland delivers quite a lot to the United Kingdom. We also have added problems that other areas of the United Kingdom do not have. We have talked of the rural areas and the highlands and islands, and the poverty in some of our inner cities, which is as great as in any inner city in the world in a nation that professes to be a civilized part of western democracy. However, there is at present an alliance between the Conservative party, which I now call the English national party, because that is what it now is, the Scottish National party, which is well known north of the border as the tartan Tories, and the Welsh nationalists, who, I am informed by my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Clwyd, who is not in his place at the moment, are called the daffodil Tories. That speaks for itself. [Interruption.]

I am somewhat disappointed in nationalist Members. I sat in silence while the Plaid Cymru spokesman did his eight minutes and I never interrupted him with a word. All that they have done this afternoon—and this is a shining example of how the nationalists conduct themselves throughout the country—is shout people down when they do not agree with them.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (in the Chair): Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that we are discussing the Barnett formula and that we should start the wind-ups quite shortly.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): I think the wind-ups have started. [Laughter.]

Mr. Peter Atkinson (in the Chair): Order. Has the hon. Member for Glasgow, North-West (John Robertson) finished?

John Robertson: No, I was about to give way to the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan).

Mark Durkan (Foyle) (SDLP): I thank the hon. Member for Glasgow, North-West (John Robertson) for not naming my party in the unholy alliance. We are in an age in which the Government talk to us about the importance of evidence-based policy, in which we are told that the focus must be on outcomes rather than just inputs, and in which the Government's priorities are based on equality, equity and meeting need. Does the hon. Gentleman not accept, therefore, that the Barnett formula indeed needs reviewing? It was not agreed between different Parliaments; it was agreed inside one person's head in Whitehall. In terms of providing policy accountability, it does no justice to this Parliament to defend a policy that neither stands the test of time nor meets the needs of people throughout the country whom this Parliament serves.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (in the Chair): Order. The hon. Gentleman should allow the hon. Member for Glasgow, North-West to continue.

John Robertson: The hon. Member for Foyle speaks a lot of sense. In view of the time, let me conclude by saying that, although the Barnett formula might not be the panacea for all this country's ills, it certainly should not be used as the tool to split it up.

3.31 pm

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Atkinson. I congratulate the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) on securing the debate, which has created great interest, as the attendance shows. I compliment him on the way in which he developed his arguments, and it is a pity that the debate has not followed his example and that it has degenerated into a debate on other matters.

We await the remarks of the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond), but a consensus is developing among a number of hon. Members that it is time to review the Barnett formula and the way that it works. That review should consider not only whether the formula should apply to the devolved nations and Administrations but whether it should apply to English regions as well. We in this Chamber can debate whether we represent the richest, the poorest or the most needy communities, but the key issue is not that but our determination to ensure fairness and transparency in the way in which the Westminster Government distribute money.

As has been said, the Liberal Democrats have been in favour of reform of the formula for a number of years. Reform was mentioned in our 2001 manifesto and was included in the Welsh Liberal Democrats' manifesto as well, so support for reform is not confined to English Liberal Democrats in Westminster but is found among Liberal Democrats in Wales and Scotland.

The formula contains an inherent unfairness in that it is based on population, and further unfairness in that the last needs-based assessment took place in 1978, since when things have moved on considerably. Changing populations and population proportions in England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland have implications for the money that is available for the different Administrations. My understanding is that the population of Wales is increasing, but not as quickly as that of England. Consequently, the factor that allows calculation of the formula figures for Wales has decreased in recent years from 5.94 per cent. to 5.84 per cent.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries and Galloway) (Lab): I am listening closely to the hon. Gentleman's arguments. He is right that populations change, but there also are significant demographic changes within populations that can create more demand, especially if there is a large elderly population. If there were a review, there is every likelihood that no extra money would actually exist. Does he therefore recognise that there would be winners and losers if there were a complete review of all aspects, and is that what he thinks should happen?

Mr. Williams: I absolutely accept what the hon. Gentleman says. The thrust of today's debate has been about fairness, and I accept that there will be winners and losers. However, if government is about anything, it should be about fairness, rather than showing undue preference. My understanding is that the Scottish population is actually decreasing.

Mr. MacNeil: No, it is going up.

Mr. Williams: Well, it has been decreasing in recent years, and the increase in the English population has an effect on the Barnett consequential.

Mr. David Hamilton: We have heard examples relating to many places in the south of England, and especially London. If there was a redistribution of a fixed amount of money to areas of dependence, we would have to ensure that places in the south of England that already receive money would not get an increase. Does the hon. Gentleman agree?

Mr. Williams: I accept that point. Whenever a formula is devised, whether for distribution of grants to local authorities by the Welsh Assembly or for distribution to English local authorities, people will debate whether it is just, which factors are relevant and how much emphasis should be put on each of them.

The hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr (Adam Price) made some very telling points. The key is transparency. As he pointed out in great detail, consideration of the bible for the Barnett formula reveals some extraordinary inconsistencies in what is included and what is not. Will the Minister say whether there is any possibility of simplifying the formula's workings, so that there is more transparency and so that people can understand the formula better?

Although the debate is about the Barnett formula, the thrust of the speech made by the hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr was that there should not be a Barnett formula for the English regions, but that there should rather be a proper and just formula for those regions. That is what my party is aiming for in terms of a formula for the devolved nations.

My constituency adjoins that of the hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Davies), and I know the problems that that area faces. At the moment, the Welsh Assembly is planning to set up a national commission to review the Barnett formula. I asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether, if the commission recommended a change, he would press for implementation by the Government or would act as a Government apologist and go back to Wales to explain why review was not possible.

With regard to the setting up of a steering committee to define the commission's terms of reference, it is interesting that the only people on the steering committee are Labour and Plaid Cymru Assembly Members and MPs. Given the "One Wales" approach to government, it would have been better if members of other parties had been included.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge) (Con): I was hoping that the hon. Gentleman would tell us how the Secretary of State for Wales replied.

Mr. Williams: The Secretary of State said that he could do both jobs. We are left guessing as to where he placed the most emphasis, however. Was he Wales' representative in Westminster or the Westminster apologist in Wales?

The hon. Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Derek Wyatt) suggested that a Joint Committee of Lords and Commons should undertake a review. That could be a very productive way forward, but a consensus is growing that something needs to be done to ensure that Westminster money is spent responsibly and fairly, with due consideration to everybody's needs.

3.39 pm

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) and all Members who have spoken in this debate. In raising this issue, I recognise that he is representing genuine concerns held by his constituents. I would like to say also that it is a pleasure to have witnessed for the second time in a week a display of fraternal relations on the Labour Benches.

The Conservative party recognises the damage that the perception of unfairness is doing to the cause of the Union. However, let us be clear on what we are talking about. As hon. Members have spelt out already, the Barnett formula was introduced in the 1970s and is still based on a measure of relative need that was last assessed in the 1970s, but since then there have been very significant changes in the structure of the UK's economy and society.

Originally, the formula was an interim measure; there was no legislative scrutiny, and it has no statutory force or democratic mandate behind it. Given that it applies only to increases in public expenditure, its effects are magnified by any acceleration in such expenditure and will also, of course, be emphasised by a deceleration in the growth of public expenditure, as we are now seeing in the comprehensive spending review. Nevertheless, the formula has worked reasonably well for many years.

In my judgment, two things have contributed to the renewed political salience of this issue. The first is that, in the post-devolution world, the money in the block grants that goes particularly to Scotland is able to support visible policy differences, rather than just a different level of funding to United Kingdom-wide policies. The different levels of funding were largely invisible for many years, but a series of announcements on clear differences in entitlement and treatment have tended to inflame that sense of injustice.

There is more than a suspicion that the Scottish National party is now exploiting that sense of injustice to try to ferment separatist sentiment in England. We have seen policies on tuition fees, nurses' pay rises, more generous residential care provision for the elderly, free dental and eye checks, and access to drugs and treatment that are not available on the NHS in England. All of those are "in-your-face" reminders to English electors of the effect of the Barnett formula. The fact that specific commitments in England—Crossrail has been cited—automatically give rise to additional contributions to the Scottish, Welsh and Northern Irish blocks does not help the situation. Secondly, undoubtedly, the broader political questions around the sustainability of the devolution settlement and the imbalance between England and Scotland in the political settlement exacerbate the sense of injustice.

Stewart Hosie: The hon. Gentleman said that the effects of the Barnett formula are exaggerated when increases in spending accelerate. However, because the base line in Scotland for comparable Departments is higher to begin with, and because there is a fixed amount of money, based on the percentage of English increases, going to Scotland, the percentage increase in Scotland is actually reduced because it is an absolute amount. Does he not recognise that, over the long term, that is a convergence formula?

Mr. Hammond: We could probably have a complicated debate about the mathematics, but I do not think that this is the time or place to do that given the time available.

Clearly, there is a legitimate question here that cannot simply be ignored, and it is more complex than some people, such as Ken Livingstone, sometimes like to present it. Let us get the matter into perspective. The figure often quoted in the media is for a £1,500 gap between England and Scotland, but almost certainly that exaggerates the effect, because if we exclude spending on social services, which is not subject to the Barnett formula and is intrinsically need-reflective, the difference is less than £1,000. Furthermore, any alternative system almost certainly would have to be based either on fiscal autonomy—Scottish taxes for Scottish spending—or on an updated needs-based formula applied to all four countries.

It is not at all clear that a needs-based distribution formula would eliminate the differential between England and Scotland, as some appear to suggest, and spending in the English regions, as has been mentioned by a number of hon. Members, varies enormously already, with public sector activity accounting for nearly 60 per cent. of the economy in the north-east, but little more than 30 per cent. in the south-east. So for those of us who wish to strengthen the Union and who are wary, therefore, of the fiscal autonomy solution, it is not clear that a revision of the formula on a needs basis would produce the results that the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley and others seem to assume.

Let me be clear where the Conservative party stands. We are not considering changes to the Barnett formula, but we recognise a growing body of opinion that questions the settlement. It is legitimate to ask whether the formula, which has served the UK well, is best suited to dealing with the distribution of public spending in the future. That is a long-term question that might well need to be addressed. However, it must be placed in context, which I shall come to in just a moment.

The Exchequer Secretary to the Treasury (Angela Eagle): Will the hon. Gentleman tell us whether it is Conservative party policy to review the Barnett formula?

Mr. Hammond: I have just told the Minister that we are not reviewing the Barnett formula, but that we recognise that a legitimate question is beginning to arise about whether it will remain the best formula for the distribution of resources within the UK.

I am trying to understand where the Labour party stands. In Scotland, apparently Wendy Alexander recognises the need to reconsider the Barnett formula. In Wales, the hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr (Adam Price) has told us that the Labour-Plaid Cymru coalition in the Welsh Assembly is conducting an official review of the Barnett formula. In England, the Prime Minister acknowledges that the formula allows Scotland

"to spend more on schools and hospitals", but apparently he does not believe that a review is necessary.

The Minister will probably tell me that that is the inevitable consequence of devolution, but to some people it will look suspiciously like one party with three different policies, depending on which electorate it is addressing—something that we are more familiar with from the Liberal Democrats. Will she clarify the position of the Labour party in England, Scotland and Wales, and will she answer categorically the question from the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) about what the Government's response will be to any recommendation from the Welsh Assembly Government on the Barnett formula?

There is no doubt in my mind that the wider need to forge a sustainable constitutional settlement between the four countries of the Union, and the asymmetry of the current arrangements, have exacerbated the perception of this problem. English voters feel not only fiscally, but now also politically, disadvantaged. There is a clear need, therefore, for a constructive Unionist solution to the West Lothian question. My right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) has made it clear that the Conservative party is committed to delivering such a solution; and a working party under my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) will bring forward policy recommendations in due course.

A proper, sustainable constitutional settlement would go a considerable way towards reducing the sense of injustice felt by English voters, and would provide a long-term context for a rational discussion about the future allocation of resources. Do the Government recognise the contribution of the West Lothian question to the sense of injustice felt towards the Barnett formula, and does the Minister recognise that the constitutional settlement within the Union represents unfinished business that needs addressing?

Clearly we will have a debate on that. The hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley, and others, will ensure that we do. We ought to ensure at least, therefore, that it is a well informed debate. To that end, will the Minister explain why no new four-nation needs assessment has been made since 1977? Does she recognise the need for such an assessment in order to inform a sensible debate, and will she give us any hope that something will be done on that front? Will she make a commitment on behalf of the Government to publish data on the comparable block grant spending in England so that we can have an official figure that would be the basis of proper comparable figures between the four countries?

We Conservatives recognise the concerns raised by the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley; those concerns are legitimate and they are not going to go away. However, ours is a Unionist party and we believe that we should seek solutions to the political and economic question within the family of the Union, solving problems and not using them as a lever to split the Union apart. We reject the approach of those who seek to exploit this debate to promote the cause of separatism. I urge the Government to recognise and embrace the case for a lasting resolution of the West Lothian question as a critical first step to achieving a sustainable, enduring constitutional settlement within which the issues that we have been discussing can be considered calmly without being overshadowed by the spectre of separatism at the table.

3.50 pm

The Exchequer Secretary to the Treasury (Angela Eagle): It is a great pleasure to be here today to discuss this extremely important issue. The Government are committed to improving economic prosperity in all our regions and within them, too, and in the devolved countries. The Government have a public service agreement target to increase growth in the poorer regions and to try to get more growth in areas that have lagged behind in the past. To some extent, I have a great deal of sympathy with some of the points that my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) made about productivity and differences between regions.

The longevity of the Barnett formula is a tribute to its effectiveness in determining the allocation of funding expenditure in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland and it continues to have some substantial advantages. We have debated some of the disadvantages, some of which are perceived and some real. However, no formula is perfect or above criticism. The Barnett formula has produced distributions of public funds over the period since it was introduced that have been perceived as generally fair and broadly acceptable. The formula has been used by both Labour and Conservative Administrations and it also underpinned the devolution settlements, which were supported by referendums in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland.

The Barnett formula has existed for many years, as hon. Members have said, but it is regularly updated. The most recent update was in the comprehensive spending review in October. That version of the formula uses the latest Office for National Statistics population figures produced in the summer, so changes in spending in the CSR reflect the latest changes in population relativities between countries.

The point of the Barnett formula in the first place was to avoid the need for detailed, line-by-line negotiations between Treasury Ministers and their counterparts in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland during public spending reviews, which happened before it was introduced. It has provided a transparent, endurable and fairly simple rule for reaching spending settlements without direct negotiation. As hon. Members have pointed out, the formula is written, in all its glory, in "Funding the Scottish Parliament, National Assembly for Wales and Northern Ireland Assembly: a statement of funding policy", which is available as published by Her Majesty's Treasury.

There is a widely held impression that the formula is responsible for determining the level of spending per head on services in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. Some colleagues have used those levels as an argument to say that there is unfairness, but that is not so. The formula is a device to allocate to the devolved Administrations a relative population share of changes in planned spending on comparable UK Government Department programmes. It is not used to determine the initial baselines because, as hon. Members have pointed out, they are inherited from the past. It is only used to determine the overall increase in the budgets of the devolved Administrations, and it is for those Administrations to decide how to allocate their budgets to individual programmes.

The Barnett formula does not determine annually managed expenditure, such as devolved spending funded by council tax and business rates, and, for example, social security, which is why sometimes the figures on public spending per head give a false impression of the actual spending. My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley argued for a shift away from a population base for public expenditure under the Barnett formula to one based on needs, but failed to recognise or acknowledge that the annually managed expenditure parts of public spending are already needs based, be they allocated through local government grants, national health service expenditure or, crucially, in poorer areas, through social security spending. So a considerable part of the expenditure of public money regionally, which appears in the figures that are often quoted, is already needs based.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley) (Lab): Can the Minister tell me what English regions benefit from the Barnett formula?

Angela Eagle: The Barnett formula seeks to allocate increases in what are known as departmental expenditure limits based initially on English departmental allocations and it seeks to ensure that the increases in DEL, rather than annually managed expenditure, are conveyed fairly on a per-population basis to the devolved authorities, which are allocated their spending through a block grant. In England, each part of public expenditure that is departmentally limited is allocated departmentally rather than on a block basis. [Interruption.] I have explained that annually managed expenditure, such as social security, that is allocated on a demand basis is not part of the Barnett formula. The formula allocates Department expenditure-limited moneys that are in some ways devolved or not devolved, as the case may be, to Scotland, Wales or Northern Ireland. It is a needs-based formula for financial allocation.

The Barnett formula does not determine annually managed expenditure; its needs-based allocations are included in the limits, which hon. Members used to say that there was unfairness, whereas it distributes only part of total managed expenditure, which is known as DEL, rather than annually managed expenditure.

Graham Stringer: I accept my hon. Friend the Minister's analysis, but does she think it fair that a huge capital project in London transfers money on no basis of need whatsoever to Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland and not to the English regions?

Angela Eagle: In respect of the Barnett formula, the issue is whether such moneys are devolved or not and, if they are, by what percentage they are devolved. That is the technical mathematics involved in all this. If money is distributed, it is because the policy is nationally determined and therefore the devolved Administrations are allocated their percentage of it on a population basis. It is purely about whether it is a devolved matter or not. Crossrail is not a devolved matter, which is why the distribution was made.

Mr. Mark Field: In relation to Crossrail, it is also important to stress that a significant proportion of the money will come from the private sector and another part of it will come from the London council tax payer. However, I recognise what the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley said, which is that there seems, at least on the surface, to be some perversity: moneys find their way to the devolved nations, but not to other parts of the UK. It is important that that £16 billion is a headline figure but a significant proportion of it will be coming from London taxpayers and businesses.

Angela Eagle: The hon. Gentleman's point is well made.

The point of this debate is to try to improve the economic performance of all areas of the country, rather than to argue that there is unfair distribution between different regions and countries in the Union. When there is differential need within as well as between regions, the Government are far more interested in improving the economic performance for everybody to ensure that we can maximise economic opportunity. That is why it is important that at the same time as we publish the pre-Budget report, we publish a review of sub-national economic development and regeneration in England, which devolves significant economic power in order to improve economic performance regionally. That has been improving faster in the poorer regions than in the others so I hope—

Mr. Peter Atkinson (in the Chair): Order. We must move on. In fact, we have a timely Division.

Housing (Northampton)

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): I am pleased to have the opportunity to debate housing in Northampton, which is the largest town in the UK and one of its most successful. It is in the Government growth area and has a successful economy, an incredibly high level of employment and a high level of home ownership. Most people in Northampton aspire to home ownership, and until recently house prices were low enough to make it a realistic option for almost all working families. Government plans for the growth area include the provision of 37,000 more homes, one third of which are to be affordable and a quarter to be social housing. All that is successful and should continue to be so, with people buying decent quality homes and building solid communities in which to bring up their families. That is what makes my constituency so special and puts the values of people there at the core of our country's success.

What I wish to deal with in the debate is different, however: the provision of social housing by Northampton borough council—some 13,500 housing units in total, including a big block of new town housing from the previous big planned growth in Northampton in the 1970s. As every hon. Member knows, good-quality social housing is central to the well-being of some of the more disadvantaged people in our constituencies. All of us deal with housing issues at our advice surgeries and visit the estates in our areas. We all know the hardship caused to people if they are homeless, if their homes are in disrepair, if they do not get the aids and adaptations that they need or if their estates become plagued by antisocial behaviour.

In my constituency, over 12 years of campaigning first as a candidate and then as an MP, I can honestly say that I have seen a real deterioration in the quality of life of many of my constituents in council housing. That has been despite the Government's commitment to the decent homes standards and to driving up council performance, and it has happened under all types of political control. When I first became an MP, we were in control at the Guildhall and there were some difficulties. Then in 2003, the Conservative party got minority control of the council and, to my surprise, things went downhill seriously. In the most recent elections, the Liberal Democrats got majority control, and things have got considerably worse to the extent that housing now far outstrips everything else in my constituency case load.

I wish to emphasise that the problems are not because of the shortcomings of individual staff, who mostly do a good, straightforward job, but because of the council's strategic management and leadership. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will point to the most recent comprehensive performance assessment report, which shows some improvements. However, the main improvement is what the report calls "stronger political leadership", which, to be honest, is to a great extent an obvious result of having a majority party administration as the result of one party getting an outright majority at the council elections.

The reality for my constituents, who depend on the council's housing services, is that things have got much worse. Over 10 years, the council's housing stock, which should have improved under the national decent homes programme, has simply got 10 years more dilapidated. Homeless people have been driven into the inadequate private sector of rented housing; people with special needs, such as domestic violence victims or those waiting for aids and adaptations, have gone unheeded; and antisocial behaviour, which is the ultimate plague of badly managed housing stock, has made life a particular misery on some estates. The most recent assessment of housing services by the Audit Commission found that Northampton provided a poor housing service with uncertain prospects for improvement. Uncertain the prospects were indeed, because they have not improved.

On disrepair, the council's housing stock condition survey found that about a third of the borough's housing was in need of improvement to bring it up to the decent homes standard. However, the CPA's overall assessment of the council's performance found that although it had identified funds to bring the properties up to standard, there was a "very high risk" that the council will fail to meet the decent homes standard by 2010. It also found that although the council had made regular statements that its ambition is to achieve the decent homes standard, they amount to aspirations and not realistic, robust and deliverable objectives.

Between 2004-05 and 2005-06, the number of council properties that were deemed unfit fell by only 3 per cent. from 28.7 to 25 per cent. By my reckoning, therefore, it will take a further eight years to achieve the decent homes standard, which well misses the Government's targets. That does not take into account the fact that some of the property is deteriorating at a substantial rate without receiving any kind of planned maintenance check from the council.

We are now less than three years away from the 2010 decent homes target. The experience of my constituents, which is reflected through my advice surgeries and my visits to their homes, is that some properties are deteriorating very quickly. The upgrading programme taking place up and down the country, which my hon. Friend the Minister must see when he looks at housing programmes, is simply not happening in Northampton. People come to my advice surgeries carrying plastic bags with belongings covered in green mould. On one estate, a woman, her husband and two children are unable to use one of their two bedrooms because of the damp and have had to throw away clothes affected by mould.

I cannot tell you the number of times, Mr. Atkinson, that I have visited homes to see the extent of the disrepair to find water pooling on floors and walls covered with mould. On one estate, I found little stalactites and stalagmites growing in the walkways as a result of long-term structural disrepair. In one home, I knelt down on the carpet to look at some mould on the wall in a corner of the room. When I got up, my clothes were soaking wet, as the carpet was completely sodden. Some properties are permeated by the smell of damp, and parents complain that their children have chest infections.

On one estate, partially completed repairs programmes had left serious holes and disrepair that had not been dealt with for many years. In the eastern Newtown district, major improvements are needed to housing that was not particularly well built to start with and that has deteriorated markedly in the past decade. Substantial reconfiguration is also needed.

In other parts of the country, it has been well recognised that estate design can contribute greatly to problems of crime. Steps have been taken to remove rat runs, block off walkways and provide people with defensible space around their homes. Recently, councillors have been told that emergency repairs only will be carried out because of the need to focus on reducing the number of voids. Emergency repairs are extremely inefficient because they mean that planned maintenance does not get done. If they are dealt with on a call-out basis, they are also extremely expensive, which leads to a reduction in the number of repairs that are completed.

Another big problem is that of homelessness. The CPA assessment of the housing department commended the council's housing and money advice service. Indeed, I used to refer homeless constituents to that service. Unfortunately, it was closed down, and homeless applicants now simply get referred to a general one-stop shop. The results for people with some of the most complex needs are truly appalling. Women who are fleeing domestic violence do not want to set out their concerns over a general counter in front of whoever else happens to be there. Therefore, they do not get the priority that they should be accorded under our homelessness legislation, which was hailed as such a milestone in supporting homeless people and in tackling real social problems.

Housing options interviews, which should be carried out after needs assessments to see if people can be housed in the private sector, are being used crudely to direct people into private sector housing that they cannot manage. For example, a pregnant and homeless 16-year-old girl who had spent a week applying for housing and being sent off to stay with friends for the night was then put into a bed-and-breakfast hostel in the red-light district. However, the hostel did not provide breakfast and the girl had a packet of Coco Pops in her little room, which she ate before she set off for school. She was then offered a two-bedroomed private rented flat, but her housing benefit would not cover the rent. I do not know how a young girl, newly homeless and pregnant and still at school, was supposed to manage a six-month tenancy without security of tenure and without the necessary money to pay the rent. There appeared to be no joint working with other agencies, so the girl's midwife had no idea where she was. Her school, which could not get any response from the council, contacted me.

Recently, a young girl who had fled domestic violence with her child applied for housing and was told that she was intentionally homeless. She did not know how to get a review or how to appeal the decision. She moved in with her parents and has now ended up in a six-month tenancy with her parents having to pay the deposit and about a third of the rent each month. That type of position is not financially sustainable and puts the young woman and her child in a revolving door of homelessness.

People suffering racial harassment have an equally difficult time in getting the type of professional support that I had thought was now routine. For example, a woman of Somali origin has had her car attacked and has been followed to the shops by a gang of youths who shouted racist abuse at her and her eight-year-old child. When she went to the council, she was told that it would be years before she could get a move.

I note that the 2006 inspection report criticised the housing department's record on diversity, yet with an increasingly diverse community, it is even more important that systems are in place to ensure that this dimension of housing is given due attention. That includes the need to provide proper support for people with disability needs. I recall one woman who came to see me because she had been promised a stair lift, two years before, so that she could get upstairs to the bathroom. Meanwhile, she was still sleeping in her front room in which she had a commode, and she washed in the kitchen sink.

We all know that estate management contributes to antisocial behaviour. An area that is run down, in which the planting is not maintained, the footpaths are not cleared and graffiti is left in place, attracts vandalism and crime. That is especially true in the eastern district of my constituency, where there is a major need for improved estate management, particularly of tree growth. The enthusiastic landscape planners who designed the estates planted too many trees and the wrong type of trees. They have confessed to that now. The result for many people is not enough light coming into their homes, and damp and damage from tree roots. In one instance, a branch fell on to a family's home and demolished a child's bedroom—fortunately during the daytime. It also means there are a lot of overgrown areas that harbour vandalism and antisocial behaviour.

On the Blackthorn estate in my constituency, the residents campaigned to get improvements and got the then Labour-controlled council to set up a special multi-agency project to tackle antisocial behaviour. That included blocking off rat runs, providing play areas in empty spaces and managing some of the more difficult tenancies. They found that a quarter of all local crimes were committed by children from one single family. People should not have to tolerate that type of severe antisocial behaviour from council tenants without the council taking action to enforce the tenancy conditions and ensure that people behave in a reasonable manner towards their neighbours. What happened on the Blackthorn estate shows what can be done if action to tackle antisocial behaviour is taken by all the agencies, not just the police, particularly on housing management. In cases in which a service is deteriorating, people plead a lack of resources, yet there are wasted resources in the council's area.

There are three hostel-type units for single people in my constituency. They are completely counter-productive. Local authorities have a responsibility to advise and assist but, ultimately, not to house single people unless they are in some other way vulnerable. The duty is to house people who are vulnerable, in particular families with children.

The three hostels have become havens for some of the most appalling antisocial behaviour, drug dealing and violence. In many of the bedsits, the single tenants have long since become families. It is not unusual to find a couple and their child or even children living in a tiny bedsit. Successive council administrations have failed to take action over the hostels, in particular to convert them to family housing.

[Ms Sally Keeble]

We are now 10 years into a Labour Government and just under three years off the target date for the decent homes standard programme, yet the reality for many of my constituents in Northampton who are dependent on the council for housing is that they find themselves trapped in steadily decaying housing stock. Those who look to the council, as they are perfectly entitled to do, for support and help and also housing find that they are turned away or life is made very difficult and they are refused help.

Over the years, the council has shed many of its responsibilities. It lost its road maintenance service, which was taken back by the county council because of the borough's poor performance. It lost its planning functions to the West Northamptonshire Development Corporation, which now also manages regeneration. It seems recently to have lost two of its major public events to the local rugby club. Housing is one of the few functions remaining to it, and it is easily the one that is most critical to the well-being of my constituents. I therefore ask the Minister to ensure that the regional office intervenes quickly and decisively to get improvements in housing services for my constituents.

The window of opportunity for large-scale public sector investment in social housing is likely to close without my constituents seeing any benefit at all. The target date for the decent homes standard programme will have come and gone, but the council will still be arguing over whether repairs and housing services should be run from one depot or another. My constituents cannot continue to wait indefinitely. The excuses have been that elections were just coming up, or that a new chief executive was just starting, yet two council elections have come and gone with changes of control, and two new chief executives have come and gone.

Frankly, I do not think that my constituents should have to wait any longer. In 21st century Britain, it is completely wrong that people should have to live in homes where green mould grows on their belongings, where they cannot walk across the estate without their child being called all the racist names under the sun, or where they have to go for months without a bath because they have no way of getting upstairs. I completely recognise that it is down to the council to deal with such problems, but, at the end of the day, the Government also have a responsibility to ensure that people get decent housing, as is their right. In this case, the council either cannot or will not get its houses in order, so I ask my hon. Friend to ensure that the regional office intervenes in the interests of my constituents.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government (Mr. Iain Wright): As a fellow north-eastern MP, it is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Atkinson. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) on securing this vital debate and on continuing to raise this crucial matter. Her commitment to housing in Northampton is shown by the fact that she has chosen to raise it for the second time this year. She had a debate on the topic in the House in March. I welcome the fact that she is a dedicated and assiduous Member of the House on behalf of her constituents.

My hon. Friend raised graphic—indeed, distressing—points, and I hope to cover many of them. Frankly, her first-class contribution also raised many wider issues about national policy, which I also hope to address in the time available.

Only last week we introduced the Housing and Regeneration Bill, which will help to deliver the Government's pledge to build 3 million new homes in mixed and sustainable communities by 2020. My hon. Friend used the expression "solid communities", which is a good turn of phrase. I shall continue to use it from now on, because it is very appropriate.

The Bill will help to address the shortage of affordable housing for first-time buyers and families, make new housing greener to tackle climate change and give social housing tenants a better deal. It will establish the new homes and communities agency, remove barriers to councils building their own social housing and make rating against the code for sustainable homes mandatory for new homes.

The Bill will also give tenants more choice and a stronger say over how their homes are managed by establishing a new social housing regulator, Oftenant, which will give tenants a stronger say in stock transfer decisions by making a tenant ballot mandatory and by giving local authority tenants greater powers over options for the future management and ownership of their homes.

I appreciate that, as the Bill stands and as we take it forward, there will be no provision for the social housing regulator to take on board local authority-owned stock, but the direction of travel set by the Government is clear on that. We hope to move towards it within two years. It is not in the Bill because of the differing performance management frameworks and the need to consult, but I hope that my hon. Friend will take some reassurance from the direction of travel and from the provision for tenants to take greater action over failures to manage property. That is a good step.

The Bill will also implement changes to improve the way in which housing services are provided, including creating a level playing field for members of the armed forces applying for local authority housing, and improving the operation of the right-to-buy scheme. Many of the proposals will have a direct effect on my hon. Friend's constituents in Northampton, North, and I hope that the Bill will be the background to future housing improvements in the town.

Another vital policy area that is already having an effect on my hon. Friend's constituents and that now falls within my direct responsibility is the Milton Keynes and south midlands growth area. Indeed, I attended my first meeting of its inter-regional board in my new role as chairman only last week. It was held in Bedford. Through that role, I look forward to getting out and about in the sub-region. I hope that I will be invited to my hon. Friend's constituency to meet people on the ground and hear about their experiences. I shall take the opportunity to find out about their growth plans, see what they are delivering and hear about the challenges that they face.

It is vital that local authorities, regional assemblies, regional development agencies, local delivery vehicles and all the other partners in the sub-region work together on common problems to find common solutions and make the best case for the area. In my time as chairman, I will support the board but also challenge it to provide the housing that the people of Northampton and the wider area need and deserve.

At the meeting last week, I was impressed by the amount of energy, ambition and positive feeling that I witnessed. Such ambition is needed to ensure that we create places where people will want to live. I am keen to ensure that growth has a positive effect on the lives of the existing residents in areas such my hon. Friend's constituency.

Tomorrow, I shall speak at the second annual Milton Keynes and south midlands conference in Kettering. I will take the opportunity to emphasise the challenge that faces the sub-region, and to pledge my support to champion what people in the area seek to achieve. This is a time of great promise and opportunity for Northampton, North. I want to ensure that my hon. Friend's constituents have housing that is as decent as possible.

On the specific issues raised by my hon. Friend, I thought that it might be useful if I provided an update on the progress made in the areas that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Housing promised to look into during the debate in March. On the wider question of the supply of decent homes, the authority is being encouraged to take a broader view and to use the opportunity and resources provided by the growth agenda to help invest in existing stock. An event to look at the wider picture afforded to the authority by Government policy in the post-Green Paper agenda will be held in December.

On the subject of Northampton borough council's review of its own stock, it has commissioned an asset management strategy to look in detail at the stock condition and the wider factors for each separate area of the town. I understand that good progress has been made in preparing that strategy, and that work will be used to develop the repairs programme for the next three years. It will be introduced at the beginning of the next financial year, and is, as my hon. Friend rightly said, vital for her constituents.

My right hon. Friend the Minister for Housing also tasked the Government office to work closely with Northampton to improve its housing services before the next Audit Commission inspection, so I was particularly concerned to hear about the failure to improve housing repairs. I understand that since the March debate, Northampton borough council has commissioned an independent report into the efficiency of its direct service organisation, which includes the housing repair service. That will inform changes to the service, and the housing sub-board—I shall come to that in a moment—has continually emphasised the need for improvement in that area. A number of immediately implementable improvements were identified during the report's preparation, and I understand that they have been implemented.

Ms Keeble: I understand that just this week the council agreed to do only emergency repairs, which is catastrophic in trying to obtain proper, sustained improvement to housing stock. It is also a big waste of money.

Mr. Wright: I agree. My hon. Friend is right to say that we should focus more on planned maintenance, as opposed to emergency maintenance, for a range of reasons. It provides greater reassurance to tenants, and is better value for money. If I may, I shall take that away and see what is going on with the emergency repair service.

The work that my right hon. Friend challenged after the March debate has been carried out through the involvement of the Government office in the housing sub-board, a group that was set up to support and advise housing staff as they implement their improvement plans. The board is made up of a chair with experience of working with registered social landlords, a chief housing officer from a neighbouring authority, and representatives from the Government office for the east midlands and the housing inspectorate. The group has instigated a number of initiatives, including a comprehensive service improvement plan. Since the last debate in March, seven meetings of the housing sub-board have been held to measure progress and to challenge the performance of the authority.

The initiatives in the improvement plan include a review of the services provided on housing estates—my hon. Friend rightly mentioned the importance of that—the previously mentioned asset management strategy, and the development of monthly performance clinics. At those clinics, individuals in the housing service are challenged on performance and results are reported back to the sub-board. Throughout the meetings, the board has emphasised the need for the authority to increase the pace of change to improve services for tenants, and will continue intensively to support and challenge them. I understand that a further Audit Commission inspection has now been scheduled for May 2008.

I am conscious of the time, Mr. Atkinson, and do not think I can get through all the points that I want to cover. If my hon. Friend will allow, I will write to her setting out the clear framework that I understand is taking place.

My hon. Friend made an interesting point about homelessness. Northampton has used a homeless prevention fund to stabilise clients at risk of homelessness, and to underpin joint working to help people retain their homes. A proportion of that fund underpins their work with victims of domestic violence, as she rightly pointed out. That sanctuary scheme enables people to make informed choices about their future plans and to feel safe while retaining their family homes if they choose to do so.

Helping people to move through supported housing to independent living has been identified as an area in need of improvement, as my hon. Friend said. The council and its partners are working with my Department's homelessness directorate and its officials, and will meet on 6 December to finalise the action plan and to formalise the joint working that is necessary to improve the service. The event will look specifically at youth homelessness and clients with mental health and complex needs as those groups are particularly at risk of repeated homelessness. The Department will also share best practice with Northampton.

Ms Keeble: When the Minister considers youth homelessness, will he also consider young women, particularly those who are pregnant?

Mr. Wright: I take that on board, and will instruct my officials to do so.

I want to comment briefly on my hon. Friend's point about the request to intervene. As she said, we are on to the third new chief executive, who is providing better organisational capacity and is improving the morale of staff, who are hard working and hard pressed. We must allow time for that to be done. She made an exceptionally fantastic point about the dire need for strategic political leadership. That is not being provided in the council, but I pay tribute to her work as the Member of Parliament for that area to ensure that the strong political leadership that her constituents deserve is provided.

Dyfed-Powys Police

4.45 pm

Mark Williams (Ceredigion) (LD): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Atkins, after what has been a marathon day for issues affecting Wales.

Adam Price (Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr) (PC): It has been Welsh day in Westminster Hall.

Mark Williams: Indeed, it has been Welsh day in Westminster Hall with debates on Welsh ports, the Barnett formula and now the critical issue of police funding as it affects Dyfed-Powys. I am delighted to have secured this debate as we move towards publication of the policing grant report.

It would be inappropriate to comment on the sudden retirement of the force's chief constable on Monday evening because investigations are continuing, and I do not propose to go down that route, however much the media might suspect my motives for the debate.

I pay tribute to the continuing success of Dyfed-Powys police in providing a widely respected police presence. It is assessed as performing well in challenging circumstances, and in particular it has established a reputation in UK policing as a leader on child protection issues, and that deserves recognition.

The Minister does not need reminding of the area covered by the force, and the number of Members on the Benches around me indicate that it covers the largest police territory of any force in England and Wales. It covers Brecon and Radnorshire, Montgomeryshire, Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr, and other constituencies. That is more than half of Wales's land mass, and parts of the area are sparsely populated. Despite that challenge, the latest police performance assessment gives Dyfed-Powys police an "excellent" mark in three out of seven categories, and a "good" mark in a further two categories. There is no doubt that the force has a record to be proud of. It is ranked joint 3rd-4th of all forces in England and Wales, and comes top of the family of rural forces. It has the highest detection rate per 1,000 population of any force in the UK, and the lowest crime rate.

One of the force's excellent marks is for the category of resources and efficiency, in recognition of its impressive work in modernising its work force, ensuring that civilian staff rather than officers handle the more administrative side of the force's work. Much remains to be done, but the force has made great progress. The force was at the forefront of the move to employ civilians to run custody suites under the management of a custody sergeant, and the local feeling is that that has been successful. Civilian staff at its communication centre are complemented by six officers working in different sectors, in contrast with other forces where a much greater proportion of officers work in call centres.

The force is ahead of the game in many ways. It has engaged in collaborative projects with other Welsh forces, so that, where appropriate, resources can be pooled and efficiency savings made. The four Welsh forces have a formally constituted committee, the Police Authorities of Wales, which provides governance for a range of collaborative activities. On serious and organised crime, and on counter-terrorism, the four forces are already sharing information and practices. The Tarian centre is well known for its effective work. The point is that while there may be opportunities for efficiencies in support services, they are limited in comparison with efficiencies that other forces might make, because they have already been made.

In providing the background to the debate, we must not underestimate the huge expense and manpower commitment that the four Welsh forces were forced to undertake following the Government's abandonment of their plans to merge those forces into one. According to figures provided by the Police Authorities of Wales, when that policy was abandoned in July last year, some 30,000 hours of police officer work had been wasted in preparation, and, according to Rhodri Morgan, the First Minister, about £1.5 million was spent in the process. There are other cost pressures on the force. For instance, the Assembly Government's decision to phase out the rural relief scheme and to replace it with a small business scheme will mean extra costs of some £100,000 for the force.

The Minister will agree that Dyfed-Powys has a remarkably successful history of participating in the fight against serious and organised crime and in counter-terrorism through collaborative work, while keeping its focus fundamentally on good-quality rural policing. The police have done good work on developing their neighbourhood strategies, the problems of which are compounded by the huge challenges of rurality. When I talk to police officers, as I did in my constituency in Aberystwyth on Monday, I hear of the vast distances that neighbourhood police officers have to cover. The fear—the perception on the ground—is that, far from delivering neighbourhood policing more effectively, the police will have to retreat from it.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): I concur with my hon. Friend on the police's work and on neighbourhood beat officers—similar things are developing in my constituency. The one disappointment is that we do not have enough community support officers. They were promised to the force, and people would have more confidence that they could go about their daily lives without fear of interruption if more officers were visible.

Mark Williams: I am grateful for that observation. There are limitations to the kind of services that such officers can provide—in my constituency, they cease work at about 10 o'clock at night—but they can make an immense contribution, particularly to public perception because of their visibility on the streets and lanes of our constituencies. Certainly, there is a perception within the Dyfed-Powys police authority that it was short-changed to the tune of around 15 officers. Approaches were made to the Home Office, which, to its credit, gave more money, but it was not enough and there is still a significant shortfall.

The comprehensive spending review has frozen the Home Office budget in real terms—there is no doubt that there is a tight settlement. If the funding grant were calculated this year as it has been in previous years, the authority would undoubtedly have to make some tough choices. We are arriving at the central reason that I organised this debate, namely, to question whether, in the context of such a tight spending round this year, it is the right time for the Government to propose changes to the police funding formula that could remove vital funding lines for rural services for forces such as Dyfed-Powys. A Department for Communities and Local Government consultation proposes folding the rural police grant into a general grant and tapering the floor grant over the CSR period. The authority estimates that, taken together, those things will mean a loss of £6.5 million per annum by the end of the review period, which is equivalent to 150 police officers.

Adam Price: The hon. Gentleman will recall that when the Dyfed-Powys police authority came here to brief the region's Members, it expressed concern about how the consultations had taken place and the fact that the Welsh police authorities were initially left out. It was also concerned that some of the changes were proposed because data were not available and were not factored into the Welsh figures. That is no fault of the Welsh police authorities, it is simply that there are no statistics.

Mark Williams: We might not be in the same party, but we were at the same meeting and share the same concerns. Dyfed-Powys perceived that it had been marginalised in the process, which is ongoing, and we expect a report fairly soon. Some of the data and criteria for judging those matters are inapplicable to the areas that we aspire to represent.

The authority is concerned at the loss of 150 police officers. Given that the authority has only limited scope to make further efficiency savings, there could be a problem for rural policing in Wales. When the rural policing grant was introduced in the late 1990s, there was cross-party acceptance of the need to recognise additional cost pressures faced by rural forces. Let me assure the Minister that those cost pressures still exist—indeed, because of rising fuel prices, for instance, the pressures are greater still. If the rural policing grant is removed, rural forces, of which Dyfed-Powys is the largest, will find themselves in a dire budgetary position. In all the scenarios presented before the ongoing consultation, Dyfed-Powys would face major deficits.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): Does my hon. Friend agree that it feels almost as if Dyfed-Powys is being punished for having such a good record on keeping crime down? Does he also agree that people who live in sparsely populated areas have every right to expect their service to be maintained, whether in Montgomeryshire or Ceredigion? At the end of the day, their demands are not great, and they have been well satisfied until now, but they are concerned that services will be cut back even from their current levels.

Mark Williams: I use the term "rural entitlement". Whichever part of Wales we work or live in, we have the same rural entitlement in principle. Frankly, I am fed up with my constituents complaining to me about alleged operational decisions that are forced on Dyfed-Powys police force by the inadequacies of current funding, which, if things continue, will become far worse.

[Mark Williams]

The floor grant was introduced in recognition of the fact that the current funding formula was unfair and in need of review. If a taper is introduced in the context of such a tight settlement, it will increase the difference between funding for different forces. The exemplar provided in the DCLG document revealed that shire police authorities in England would lose between £4.3 and £10.7 million, which indicates the scale of the loss that Dyfed-Powys would face.

That brings me to the wider point made by the hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr (Adam Price) about the inadequacies of the consultation with Welsh police authorities. The fact that I must look at exemplars referring to the English shires rather than practice in rural Wales is of great concern. There is a statutory requirement for Government to consult police authorities on any change in formula grant distribution, but copies of the consultation were not sent to Welsh authorities, and the exemplar work excludes Wales. That cannot be right.

When Dyfed-Powys queried the matter with the Home Office, it was told to send submissions directly to the Home Office as opposed to DCLG. Wales has been totally overlooked throughout the process, and I hope that the Minister will recognise that and ensure that it never happens again.

In the face of what are expected to be no better than flat-rate increases for UK police forces overall, expected efficiency targets and substantial cashable efficiency targets, Dyfed-Powys is likely to face significant budgetary pressure. Unless the authority gets increases of more than 4.5 per cent per annum, it predicts that baseline services will be reduced.

The Minister and the Department have in the past acknowledged the need to reform the police formula funding methodology, which I would support. We need a more transparent, open and wholesale review of the process, involving all police authorities in England and Wales. Such a review would look at the accuracy and appropriateness of indicators, which relates to the point made by the hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr. It should ensure that the data it uses are available across England and Wales. For instance, the log of bars per hectare measure discriminates against a rural area; why not use a log of bars per 100,000 population? Indicators on economic migration are also inadequate. In my village, just north of Aberystwyth, the population multiplies by five in the summer months. That needs to be factored in.

In previous years, the council tax precept has borne the brunt of budget shortfalls. In 1998, the precept made up 15 per cent. of Dyfed-Powys's budget; it now makes up 35 per cent. of the funding needed to maintain the force.

Those problems exist without the proposed funding formula changes. I might be repeating myself, but it is critical to ask whether, in the context of such a tight spending review, it is time to scrap the rural policing grant and taper floor support following such minimal and inadequate consultation with Welsh forces.

Dyfed-Powys police authority has told me that the scale and impact of the proposals will be completely devastating to the force—a force with such an impressive record. On that sad and sobering note, I look forward to what the Minister has to say.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Vernon Coaker): I congratulate the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mark Williams) on securing the debate and on the measured but powerful way in which he made his case, which was extremely helpful. He has some of the other Welsh Members from the area with him, including the hon. Members for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr (Adam Price) and for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams). May I also say how much I welcome the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik)? He and I have spent many hours together in various Northern Ireland Committees and on various pieces of Northern Ireland business. I am very pleased that all those hon. Members are present. They are all assiduous in campaigning for their constituents. Whatever the political differences between us, the reason that they are all here this afternoon is to do what they can to ensure that their constituents have the best possible service. I commend them for that, particularly the hon. Member for Ceredigion.

I shall start by setting out the context and the existing situation. Since 1997, the Dyfed-Powys police force, like every other police force in England and Wales, has received substantial and significant increases in Government grant. In the past decade, Dyfed-Powys has seen a 20 per cent. increase in real terms in central Government grant. That is a huge investment in local policing. Dyfed-Powys police force is receiving £51.8 million in general grant this year—an increase of 3.6 per cent. from 2006-07. That is in line with the broadly flat rate increase of 3.6 per cent. for all forces in England and Wales. On top of the general grant, Dyfed-Powys will receive about £13 million from a range of other Government funding.

I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman recognises that the product of that significant investment from both central and local resources is clear. On 31 March this year, Dyfed-Powys had 1,177 police officers, compared with 1,005 10 years ago—an increase of 172, which is 17 per cent. The number of support staff had grown from 322 to 594—an increase of 272, which is virtually 85 per cent. All those extra support staff help to release more officers for front-line duties, where we all want to see them. They are also supported by 77 police community support officers.

I very much welcomed the intervention by the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire. PCSOs will do sterling work not only in the constituency of the hon. Member for Ceredigion, but in constituencies in the rest of the Dyfed-Powys area, the rest of Wales and, indeed, in England. We need to demonstrate continually our support for them. They do a different job from that of police officers, but they do an excellent job, for which I am sure that most of our constituents are very grateful, so I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman intervened on that point.

Let us not focus just on inputs. In 2006-7, total recorded crime was down, violent crime was down and burglary was down from the year before. Like the hon.

Member for Ceredigion and the other hon. Members, I pay tribute to all those in Dyfed-Powys police whose efforts have contributed to that.

Dyfed-Powys police have been supported by the funding floor for many years to ensure that they have had year-on-year increases in grant. This year, Dyfed-Powys police are receiving £4.5 million more than their strict police funding formula allocation. Part of that additional money comes from grant that would otherwise go to South Wales police, but the vast bulk of the support for Dyfed-Powys—£3.6 million—comes from additional money provided by the Home Office from outside the general grant settlement.

I have set all that out to establish the context and to make clear the situation of Dyfed-Powys. However, I know that the hon. Member for Ceredigion is keen to look to the future. As the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire will know, normally I try to answer specifically the questions that are raised, so I apologise that I cannot be as specific today as I would normally be in such a debate. I hope that the hon. Member for Ceredigion will find in the future that when I answer questions as a Minister, I actually try to answer the question. However, I cannot do that at present, for which I apologise. He will appreciate that we will be announcing very shortly details of the police funding settlement for the next three years, so I cannot give details today, much as I would like to pre-empt that announcement. Obviously, he would like to know about all of that.

Mark Williams: I very much hope that the spirit of the debate is a continuing dialogue between Dyfed-Powys, the Home Office and hon. Members. Would the Minister be prepared to accept a delegation from Dyfed-Powys police authority and perhaps a cross-party gathering of the MPs for the area to express concerns and hear some of the straight-talking answers to which he has referred? We would very much appreciate such a dialogue with him.

Mr. Coaker: I am always happy to meet hon. Members and their constituents. I shall talk to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Security, Counter-Terrorism, Crime and Policing about that, but certainly I would be prepared to meet the hon. Gentleman, his parliamentary colleagues and some of his constituents to discuss these matters.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the three-month consultation on formula grant distribution that took place over the summer and closed in mid-October. The consultation was preceded by several meetings of the police allocation formula working group, a Home Office-chaired group that includes representatives from the Association of Chief Police Officers and the Association of Police Authorities, which considered possible changes to the funding formula. I will say, slightly defensively, that one member of the group was the director of finance and resources for Dyfed-Powys, so the hon. Gentleman can be sure that the interests of his local force were properly represented in that forum.

We received responses from most police forces or authorities, including from three of the Welsh forces, which I hope provides some reassurance that the consultation included consultation with and representations from Welsh forces. We have considered very carefully the representations from all police stakeholders received in response to the public consultation. That includes the representations from the Welsh forces, including those from the former chief constable of Dyfed-Powys. We have noted his concerns, particularly about sweeping rule 2 grants, which are specific to rural policing, into the general pot. As the hon. Gentleman pointed out, the Dyfed-Powys police force has a particular interest in the rural policing fund. That is not surprising, because with 4,225 square miles, it covers the largest area of any force in England and Wales.

Let me be clear: the purpose of the consultation paper was not to disadvantage rural authorities. Our intention was to take the views of the police service on a range of options. One of those was to ensure that we were using the most up-to-date data in calculating the police funding formula. The hon. Gentleman and his colleagues talked about ensuring that we use the correct data.

The other option concerned ways to convert funding from specific grants, which can be used for a specific purpose, to general grant, which can be spent at the discretion of police authorities. As the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire said, there is a tension between grants for specific purposes, which in many respects people like because they say that the money goes to an earmarked pot—a specific thing—and the representations that we often receive from the APA and chief constables that that money should not be ring-fenced, and that it should all be put in a general pot so that it can be used in the way that they feel is appropriate in their local area. There is a balance to strike between those two positions.

Lembit Öpik: The Minister will understand that there is a particular concern in a rural area such as that covered by Dyfed-Powys police. We are worried that if we do not have that ring-fenced money we will lose out overall. We tend to feel a bit discriminated against for being rural. With huge areas being covered by a few police officers—from Welshpool to Machynlleth in my case—we think that we will continually have to cut back without that money. What assurances can the Minister give us that that will not be the case?

Mr. Coaker: The only reassurance that I can give the hon. Gentleman is that we have heard the point about the importance of the specific grant for rural policing for the huge areas of Dyfed-Powys and of some other forces in England and Wales. We have heard the representations, and we are considering them alongside others.

Hon. Members will have to wait until the police funding settlement announcement for the Government's conclusions on the matters about which we consulted. However, in order to reassure the hon. Gentleman, we are not going to implement changes that would jeopardise the stability of the entire finance system for police authorities. As in previous years, the settlement announcement will be followed by a six-week consultation period, and that may be when we should have the meeting that was referred to earlier. We will, of course, take account of any further representations that he or his hon. Friends may wish to make; there will be a further opportunity for the hon. Gentleman to represent his constituents.

[Mr. Coaker]

I know that the hon. Member for Ceredigion is interested in the impact of local tourism, and that he recently tabled parliamentary questions about the use of a tourism indicator. There is little more I can add. The current formula was consulted on in the summer of 2005, and introduced in 2006-07 after a comprehensive review in which representatives from ACPO and the APA were involved. The review concluded that there was no accurate measure of tourism impacts, and it therefore did not include them in the new formula. Dyfed-Powys benefited from the revised formula changes, and its position was further protected by the application of a virtually flat-rate grant increase for all police authorities for both 2006-07 and 2007-08.

One of the real successes of recent years has been the roll-out of neighbourhood policing, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman knows. However, Dyfed-Powys was one of three forces that were inadvertently disadvantaged by the decision to alter the funding arrangements for community support officers and neighbourhood policing in 2007-08, which was announced in a written ministerial statement by my right hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty) when he was Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety. The three forces had not previously been able to commit to early acceleration in the roll-out of neighbourhood policing, so made representations that they needed further help to complete neighbourhood policing coverage in their areas. We were pleased to be able to find some money to help them get back on track. For Dyfed-Powys, it amounted to £186,000 towards the cost of an additional 12 PCSOs.

Finally, I want to say something about force efficiency, to which the hon. Member for Ceredigion referred. Dyfed-Powys has a good record of delivering efficiency gains over and above the targets set since 1999-2000. However, over the coming years, increasing efficiency and productivity will become more important. Forces will have to work together and across communities, and take every opportunity to deliver services more effectively. I take the point made by the hon. Gentleman about good collaboration between the four police forces in Wales and the way in which they are trying to develop that relationship into an ever-closer partnership. Many forces have already gained from working in that way.

I conclude by saying that I am happy to meet the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends in due course. The best time will probably be after the settlement has been announced, when they will be able to see the figures and what has happened. He can then make further representations if he wishes. I say again that Dyfed-Powys has received significant additional money. There will always be a debate about whether more resources are needed and about how they should be deployed.

I am happy to join the hon. Gentleman in congratulating Dyfed-Powys police on its excellent record in financial management and in fighting crime and making people feel safer. Today's debate has been an important contribution to that, and I congratulate the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends on the measured and constructive way in which they put their case.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at fourteen minutes past Five o'clock.

[SIR NICHOLAS WINTERTON in the Chair]

Inter-Parliamentary Union

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Roy.]

2.30 pm

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): I welcome the Minister and the chairman of the British group of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, the right hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd).

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Jim Murphy): It is an absolute delight to serve with you as our Chairman, Sir Nicholas. I look forward to an informed and enjoyable debate on the important work of the IPU. I am delighted to open the fourth debate on the subject.

As we all know, the IPU contributes much to the promotion and support of democracy and human rights around the world. I welcome the opportunity to debate its work. The responsibility would normally fall to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, who is travelling in Singapore. No doubt she would enjoy being here much more, and I know how important she considers the IPU in her ministerial role.

The IPU was co-founded by William Randal Cremer, a Liberal Member of Parliament, more than 100 years ago. Since then, it has gone from strength to strength. Cremer was the first British recipient of the Nobel peace prize and the first person to be the sole winner. His main interest in life was the quest for world peace, and co-founding the IPU was a visible demonstration of his beliefs. Since that time, the British group has played a major role in the development of the IPU, and Members of the House have participated at all levels.

The IPU is an indispensable part of this country's foreign policy. Parliaments and parliamentarians can often carry on talking to each other even when their Governments disagree and even when, on occasion, those Governments do not have any conversation or contact. That can be of real value both to us at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and, importantly, to the UK more generally. Parliamentarians respect and trust each other in the forum, sometimes more than they do a foreign Government. IPU delegations can also be incredibly effective through the informal links that they build up with parliamentarians in other countries. They can have a quick chat, a cup of coffee or e-mail correspondence with one of their colleagues from abroad, which is harder for Governments to do as their relations are often, perhaps unavoidably, much more formal. The IPU is an important part of UK diplomacy and plays a significant role by keeping links strong and reminding countries of the UK's good will towards them.

I wish to place on the record my congratulations to the British group of the IPU on its excellent work. I know that it is well respected in the IPU because of its active role in debates. In addition, I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd), our chairman. She is not only a right hon. Friend but a friend, which is sometimes more difficult. She is rightly regarded in all parts of the House as a woman of great principle, phenomenal dedication and dogged determination, even when her views are not in the majority, which says more about her than about others. She has done a phenomenal job in her role.

Apart from founding the organisation, members of the British group have led the IPU or sat on its executive committee over the years. The group also arranges a busy programme of bilateral inward and outward visits, and I look forward to hearing more about the activities that have been undertaken. The IPU does not shy away from commenting on important issues, and nor should it. Parliamentary democracy and gender issues have been continuing focuses, and topics such as climate change, the situation in the middle east and recent events in Burma are just a small sample of the range of matters recently addressed. I am grateful for the opportunity that the IPU offers Foreign Office officials to contribute to its briefings and for the feedback that we receive.

I know that the House will want to join me in paying great tribute not just to the work of the group's chairman, as I have said, but to its staff and those who help to make possible the crucial work that the IPU carries out. In general in public life we do not pay tribute to many of the people whom we rarely read about or see in the headlines, but the staff make the IPU work effectively.

I know that a number of right hon. and hon. Members wish to participate in the debate, and I look forward to hearing their contributions. With your permission, Sir Nicholas, and the leave of the House, I look forward to having the opportunity to respond to the debate later.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): I am sure that the House will give the Minister the right to reply at the end of the debate.

Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley) (Lab): It is a particular pleasure to speak in this debate under your chairmanship, Sir Nicholas. You are one of the more active members of the IPU executive, and you have had an interest in the work of the IPU throughout your parliamentary career. It is also a pleasure to have my hon. Friend the Minister, who is also a friend, here for the debate.

I shall be stepping down as chair of the British group of the IPU at the end of this year, after three years. I should like to thank all my fellow officers—my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Roger Berry) and the hon. Members for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Derek Conway) and for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans)—and my colleagues on the executive committee for their interest in and support for the group. In addition, I thank all parliamentarians who have participated on inward and outward delegations and in any IPU-related activities. On behalf of the British group, I particularly wish to thank the secretariat, members of which are watching the debate this afternoon with a watchful eye, as always, to see that we do not stray too far and to offer their support. They have been particularly helpful in the three years for which I have been chair.

I wish to mention Saudi Arabia, which is a member of the IPU. Hon. Members will have heard the news this morning that most of those in the race for the US Democratic presidential nomination have called on King Abdullah to reconsider and cancel the ruling on punishing a woman who was a gang rape victim. She was sentenced to 200 lashes and six months in jail because she was in an unrelated man's car. The car was attacked by a gang, who raped her. Hillary Clinton has said that King Abdullah should cancel the ruling, Barack Obama said that the sentence was "beyond unjust" and similar criticism has come from the other Democratic candidates. The 19-year-old victim has not been named, but she is known as "the Qatif girl". She was originally given a lighter sentence but it was increased on appeal last week, as were those of the seven men involved in the attacks.

The case has attracted much attention and criticism throughout the world. The US State Department has expressed astonishment at the sentence. I would be interested to hear from my hon. Friend the Minister what the Foreign Office has said about that case. It is completely unacceptable for the rape victim to be punished for reporting the rape and for her lawyer to be suspended. The lawyer, Abdul Rahman al-Lahem, has handled the country's most controversial cases. His licence was revoked last week by the judiciary in that town, Qatif, and he says that he has been banned from the courtroom for refusing to allow his client to attend a hearing in which she would have had to come face to face with her rapist. If the IPU were meeting now, the case would certainly be viewed as a matter of urgency for its conference. I would be very pleased to hear that we had given a similar condemnation and called for King Abdullah to take action.

During my time in office, British MPs and peers have met their counterparts from all four corners of the globe. They have either acted as hosts or been guests in countries from Albania to Azerbaijan, from Brazil to Burundi, from Korea to Kyrgyzstan, and from Madagascar to Mexico. Since last year's debate on the IPU, in July 2006, the British group has received delegations from Venezuela, Macedonia, the Republic of Korea, Brazil, Kyrgyzstan, Cuba and Gabon. Our members were able to visit their counterparts in Algeria, Azerbaijan, Jordan, Madagascar, Mexico, Panama, Burundi, Cambodia, Vietnam and Albania.

At recent IPU assemblies, we have had bilateral meetings with parliamentarians from Japan, Libya, Pakistan, Venezuela, Malta, South Africa, Cambodia, Egypt, Ethiopia, Indonesia, Iran, Nepal, Somalia, Uruguay, India, Namibia, Pakistan, China and Syria. Anyone who thinks that an IPU conference is a romp has another think coming. We have to work very hard to ensure that bilateral meetings are of value to both sides. Strengthening our ties with fellow parliamentarians is what the British IPU group is all about.

In order to have a meaningful dialogue with our colleagues, we need to ensure that we are discussing a wide range of subjects. During my time as chair, I have tried to push the boundaries a bit. I have encouraged the British IPU group to focus more on interaction with other parliamentarians on specific concerns regarding human rights violations, continuing conflict and humanitarian crises. I do not believe in confrontation for its own sake, but parliamentarians in the UK tend to take things for granted. We can express our views on the Floor of the House of Commons and the House of Lords, in the media and to our colleagues without the fear of persecution, harassment, torture or death. Tragically, it is not the same for too many of our colleagues all over the world.

Therefore, as people who have those freedoms, we have a duty to stand up and speak for colleagues who are in trouble all over the world. We need to take every opportunity to raise the cases of parliamentarians whose rights have been abused and whose mandates are not respected. When we meet parliamentarians from other countries, we must therefore make them aware of our concerns about parliamentarians whose lives or livelihoods are at risk, our desire to help to get the matter resolved and our belief that fellow parliamentarians should do the same.

The IPU committee on human rights of parliamentarians, which I chaired for three years until last year, investigates cases of injustices against parliamentarians the world over. Parliamentarians depend on their committee members and all IPU members to raise awareness of cases and to lobby for progress. At the last IPU assembly, which was held this year in Geneva, my former fellow committee member, who is now chair, Senator Sharon Carstairs from Canada, strongly appealed to IPU member Parliaments to provide more active follow-up to help to address concerns in 34 public cases, some of which illustrate a total disregard for the most basic human rights of parliamentarians.

I want to highlight cases in four countries in particular, starting with Eritrea, which faces a truly appalling situation. Eleven former MPs have been held incommunicado since 18 September 2001 after publicly calling for democratic reforms. No one knows where they are being held or even whether they are all still alive. They have never been brought before a judge, and the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights has concluded that the most basic rights of those parliamentarians have been violated. The Eritrean authorities, I am sorry to say, have shown a total lack of interest in addressing those cases.

There is another batch of cases in Palestine. Everyone in the IPU internationally is engaged in some of those cases. The case of Marwan Barghouti has been long-running. He was re-elected as a member of the Palestinian Legislative Council in the January 2006 elections, but he is serving five life sentences and two 20-year prison terms, which the Tel Aviv district court handed down in June 2004. The expert legal report commissioned by the IPU, by someone we sent to follow the trial, stated that the trial did not meet the fair trial standards that Israel, as a state party to the international covenant on civil and political rights, is bound to respect. Mr. Barghouti was transferred to Israel in breach of the fourth Geneva convention and the Oslo accords. I am disappointed to note that when the IPU raised this case and related concerns with the Israeli parliamentary authorities it received no co-operation.

The second case involves Mr. Hussam Khader, a former member of the PLC. He is serving a prison sentence, which was handed down in November 2005, after a plea bargain was reached regarding the charges and the sentence. None of the charges involved any violent acts on his part. Again, in view of the report of the lawyer who observed Mr. Khader's trial on behalf of the IPU, the committee considered that the trial fell far short of being fair. That is one of the reasons that the IPU urges the authorities to release him. When the Israeli Government announced in July that it intended to release Palestinian prisoners who had "no blood on their hands", the committee asked the secretary-general to send a special appeal to the speaker of the Knesset, requesting her to ensure that Mr. Khader would be on the list of those to be freed as he fell into the category of those eligible for release. However, that was to no avail. Mr. Khader was not among the 225 Fatah prisoners released by the Israeli authorities. The IPU committee deeply regrets that its constant appeals have again gone unheard.

The third case involves Mr. Ahmad Sadat who was elected as a member of Parliament in January 2006. In March 2006, he was abducted from a prison in Jericho and taken to Israel. The Israeli authorities wanted him for the murder in January 2002 of the Israeli Minister of Tourism. A month after his abduction, however, the charge was dropped for want of evidence. The committee believes that that clearly shows that his abduction and transfer to Israel were not related to the murder charge but rather to his political activities. According to some media reports, other security-related charges were brought against him, but at present it is unclear whether any charge at all is pending. Again, despite many requests, the Israeli authorities have provided no official information on his situation. The IPU committee is urging the Israeli authorities either to release him immediately or to charge him with a recognisable criminal offence and try him without delay.

The last batch of cases involves members of Parliament elected in January 2006 on the Hamas list. Forty-one MPs were seized by the Israeli security forces last year, in the context of military operations in the Gaza strip to obtain the release of an Israeli soldier kidnapped on 25 June 2006 in a cross-border attack on military installations. An Israeli court ordered their release on bail on 12 September 2006, but the decision was overturned on appeal. They, too, remain in detention.

The MPs are accused of membership and leadership of a terrorist organisation, which in fact means that they are accused of having participated—and having been elected—in elections that were internationally recognised as free and fair. Since that cannot possibly be a crime, the IPU human rights committee is urging the Israeli authorities to release them immediately or to bring valid charges against them as soon as possible. The IPU is also concerned about the conditions of their detention.

The last case concerns the speaker of the Palestinian Legislative Council, Dr. Aziz Dweik, who was detained in the same circumstances in early August 2006. The same considerations apply in his case. The IPU continues to be concerned about the conditions of his detention and fear that they may result in a serious decline in his health.

All over the world, when the IPU human rights committee makes representations to member countries, they respond. Sometimes they need prodding, but they do eventually respond. It does not matter in what part of the world cases occur, I find it unacceptable that the Israeli authorities continue to ignore the IPU and the committee and will not address their concerns or requests for further information. I call on them now to engage with the IPU, and to respect the Palestinian parliamentarians' mandate and international human rights norms and due process.

Then there is Burma. In 1990, following their electoral success, newly elected representatives from the National League for Democracy should have taken their seats in Parliament and formed a Government. Instead, they disappeared or were killed, imprisoned or hounded out of the country. Since that time, the IPU and UK parliamentarians have lobbied on their behalf and met exiles on many occasions to discuss their plight and that of their fellow countrymen.

Unfortunately, however, as we all know, far from improving, the situation in Burma has worsened. The recent massive crackdown by the military on the peaceful demonstrations by monks and civilians bears testimony yet again to the fact that the military junta does not want to engage in any credible process of transition to democracy. Scores of protesters—we do not know how many; we can only guess at the number—have been arbitrarily arrested, as have 13 parliamentarians-elect. In several cases, the whereabouts of prisoners remain unknown.

I am sure that all members of the British group and Members of this House will join me in endorsing the IPU's call to the Burmese authorities to release the prisoners immediately and unconditionally, along with the 13 MPs-elect who were already languishing in prison before the demonstrations took place, and to refrain from further repressing dissent, lift all restrictions on human rights and end the harassment of political activists.

It is important that member Parliaments of the IPU, particularly those from countries such as China, India and the Association of South East Asian Nations countries, pursue and strengthen action in support of the parliamentarians-elect, and in support of respect for democratic principles in Burma. I and others on the IPU executive have been in regular contact with members of the ASEAN inter-parliamentary Myanmar caucus to discuss joint action. Indeed, at the recent conference in Geneva, the UK withdrew its urgent resolution on climate change in favour of a resolution that criticised events in Burma. Since then, we have continued to be in regular contact with the caucus, and I commend the delegates' continued efforts to lobby their Governments for specific measures to be taken against the Burmese military regime.

I was encouraged by a robust emergency resolution last October that we all agreed to, with some exceptions. There were some very interesting votes, as hon. Members will know, by some of the delegations that we did not quite expect to come on board with us. At that IPU assembly, the British delegation had formal meetings with the Chinese, Indian and Singaporean delegations and asked them to consider travel bans and targeted sanctions if the junta did not take concrete steps to restore democracy in Burma.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): Does the right hon. Lady agree that one of the ideal opportunities afforded by the assemblies is less formal dialogues between parliamentarians? Conversations are held not between Members of Parliament and Governments but between MPs and MPs from other countries. The last assembly in Geneva gave us such an opportunity. In particular, we had lengthy discussions with a Chinese member of Parliament with whom we were able to raise directly the issue of Burma. MPs may not be able to do anything about a situation, but they can certainly take back to their own Parliaments the intensity of feeling that exists in countries such as the United Kingdom about the atrocities in countries such as Burma.

Ann Clwyd: The hon. Gentleman was a member of the delegation and took part in some of the bilateral meetings. I absolutely agree that they are useful, informative and vital to both groups. Delegations have not agreed on some issues, as the hon. Gentleman knows, but on others there has been surprising consensus, even among countries from which we did not expect consensus to be forthcoming. The parliamentary authorities—I am particularly addressing the Whips of all parties—should not underestimate the importance of IPU delegations.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): He was a Whip.

Ann Clwyd: My hon. Friend points out that the Minister was once a Whip, but, if I remember rightly, he was a benign Whip. Perhaps he would like to share some of his experiences with us later.

Many hon. Members are interested in pursuing the case of Zimbabwe. Although the Zimbabwean Parliament debated the beating of two Opposition MPs, Mr. Biti and Mr. Chamisa, by law enforcement officers at a prayer meeting on 11 March, and a subsequent brutal attack on Mr. Chamisa at Harare international airport, it does not seem to have taken any action to ensure that those criminal acts were duly investigated and the perpetrators brought to justice.

Opposition parliamentarians have allegedly been tortured. Mr. Madzore was arrested on 28 March, and allegedly tortured before being released when charges were withdrawn in August, and Mr. Job Sikhala was allegedly tortured in January 2003. The IPU committee has noted on several occasions that in those cases the Zimbabwean authorities did nothing to comply with their constitutional duties, and the Parliament failed to exercise its oversight functions effectively. On the contrary, law enforcement agencies were allowed to continue torturing and ill-treating even Members of Parliament with impunity. That is unsatisfactory.

When I chaired the committee for three years—it was made up of five members of Parliament from various countries—we had representatives of Zimbabwe appear before it, and the leader of the Zimbabwean delegation, instead of addressing the cases that we brought before him, always said that it was the fault of the British. We never got beyond that, so on one occasion I asked one of my committee colleagues, who was the Speaker of the Niger Parliament, to take the chair to see if he would be treated differently, but he was also blamed for the British, and the delegation refused to address the cases that we brought before it.

I have said before, and I say again, that ill treatment of parliamentarians is often just the tip of the iceberg in countries where human rights abuse is common. If members of Parliament are subject to abuse, it is more than likely that the people whom they are supposed to represent suffer even more. When lobbying for them, we are often able to address the plight of the wider community, such as activists, journalists, human rights defenders, anti-corruption campaigners, and the poor, the marginalised and the oppressed ethnic communities. To that end, while I have been chair, I have initiated a link with the all-party parliamentary human rights group, which now provides briefings for our members on the human rights situation in the country in question, and they supplement information from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

I thank all my colleagues who have raised specific human rights issues when on delegations and in bilateral meetings. Some recent discussions with parliamentary counterparts in which I have been involved have been free and frank, but to address the issues that really matter, one inevitably touches a raw nerve sometimes. On 13 November, The Times reported a private meeting of the British group with the Iranian delegation at the IPU assembly in April this year. Details of that meeting were provided following a request under the Freedom of Information Act 2000 to the FCO.

Minutes taken at that meeting by an FCO official describe a member of our delegation referring to the hangings in Iran of Mahmoud Asgari and Ayaz Marhoni in 2005 in Iran. They were killed for alleged homosexual activities, although they were juveniles at the time of their arrest. The leader of the Iranian delegation was unflinching. The record states that he explained that according to Islam, homosexuality and lesbianism are not permitted. He also said that if homosexual activity was in private, there was no problem, but that those taking part in overt activity should be executed. He argued that homosexuality was against human nature, because humans were here to reproduce and homosexuals did not reproduce. The sort of discussion that our delegation had with the Iranians following those statements can be imagined. That is concrete evidence of the sort of challenging discussions that we have, and shows that we do not flinch from raising such issues with our counterparts from other countries.

I want to mention the work of two British IPU members. My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) and Lord Morris of Aberavon were appointed rapporteurs for their respective committees. They are helping to ensure that the IPU addresses timely and important topics.

Lord Morris is co-rapporteur of the committee on peace and international security, which is tasked with producing and presenting a report on "The role of parliaments in striking a balance between national security, human security and individual freedoms and in averting the threat to democracy." He will have to incorporate feedback received from the last IPU assembly before producing a final joint report and draft resolution with his co-rapporteurs from South Africa and India at the next IPU assembly in April 2008 in Cape Town, South Africa.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon is co-rapporteur of the committee that is looking at democracy and human rights, and working on the topic, "Migrant workers, people trafficking, xenophobia and human rights" with his co-rapporteur from Mexico. Some of the position papers produced for some of the specialist committees are excellent, and I only wish that there was a system by which every member country of the IPU could debate some of those reports. I am thinking particularly of a paper on missing people, and it can be imagined how many countries provided information and took part in that debate. Perhaps an hon. Member here might want to raise that topic at some time.

The IPU internationally is undergoing reform. To date, it has been relatively little known on the international stage, except among those who are closely involved with its work. It has been viewed at best as a worthy talking shop, and at worst as a costly irrelevance. Of course, I believe that it is a useful forum for parliamentarians to engage with one another, and to work together for the common good. However, it is right to review its procedures and effectiveness, because there is definitely room for improvement.

We need greater opportunity for meaningful dialogue and interaction, instead of what tends to happen, which, as colleagues who have attended IPU conferences know, is that representatives make token set-piece speeches. Sometimes that may continue all day. If representatives of 146 countries all want their few minutes on the platform, yet their remarks do not relate to any previous speeches in the debate, it is frustrating for all those who believe in proper debate. AIDS, poverty, corruption, gender discrimination and ethnic persecution have all been the subject of major debates.

The Geneva headquarters of the IPU should consolidate its mechanisms and revise its working methods. The committee that I chaired for three years, and of which I was a member for five years, works on a shoestring budget with limited support from the wider organisation, yet the members of the secretariat who work on that committee are dedicated to their work. It is generally not known that the IPU secretariat and the secretary-general deal with a lot of cases in private. We get people out of jail, we ensure that parliamentarians can exercise their mandates and we get people out of detention. However, that takes a lot of effort by individuals, and a great number of people have come to the House of Commons—all my hon. Friends will know of such occasions—to thank members of the IPU for their efforts in getting people out of jail. The former deputy Prime Minister of Malaysia is a case in point, but we could name several others.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): Hearing the right hon. Lady talk about getting people out of jail and detention, it occurs to me that Amnesty International does similar work and lobbies in similar ways. Has the IPU ever considered working with Amnesty International on individual cases?

Ann Clwyd: Much of our information about individual cases comes from Amnesty International and other human rights organisations. What the hon. Gentleman suggests is a good idea, but it happens already. The IPU secretariat in Geneva has close links with Amnesty International, Human Rights Watch and other similar organisations. Much of our information comes from people in the relevant country or from organisations observing what is happening there. Without such information, the IPU would find it difficult to make its cases stand up, although I can say with great confidence that they do stand up. I have with me the kind of file that the IPU human rights committee puts together on individual MPs, including many from Colombia and Eritrea, for instance. It lists all the circumstances and details of people's cases, which are subsequently made public. If anybody wants to see these files, the IPU secretariat has copies, which give a lot of interesting detail. Unfortunately, Parliament does not have an opportunity to discuss individual cases, except on occasions such as this.

Jeremy Corbyn: I know that this is slightly wide of the subject and that you, Sir Nicholas, will stop me if I am too far off the mark, but does my right hon. Friend not think that it would be useful to have Select Committee scrutiny of UN and international human rights matters—separate from the very good work done by the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs—to give greater emphasis to these issues worldwide?

Ann Clwyd: Yes, I do agree that it would be useful to have Select Committees in Parliament monitoring UN organisations. In the past, the Select Committee on International Development has looked at various parts of the UN, particularly when there was a debate about whether we should continue funding UNESCO, and we have looked at many other UN organisations. The UK is a large contributor to such organisations, so greater scrutiny is needed across the board, and we should consider the UN Commission on Human Rights in particular.

At the 116th IPU assembly in Bali in April, the human rights committee submitted 35 cases of 126 Members of Parliament in 18 countries around the world, all of which were adopted by the conference as a whole, and I have just discussed some of those cases. Of course, it is important that the whole conference adopts the committee's decisions at the end, but the committee could do a lot more with more funding, which would enable the IPU to undertake more missions, with more concrete follow-up by member Parliaments.

The committee on middle east questions should also be strengthened. I was recently put on that committee; the chairman is a Mongolian Member of Parliament, and about five other Members of Parliament from all over the world are members. Palestinian and Israeli delegations have invited the committee to the region to see what is happening on the ground. Until recently, the executive committee had not provided the necessary funding for the visit to go ahead, but at the latest assembly, in Geneva, I secured a commitment to send and fund a mission. I hope that that will enable parliamentarians to engage constructively on one of the most important and divisive matters facing the world today.

We also need to keep pressing the international IPU secretariat on the need for greater accountability and transparency. The organisation is meant to promote good governance and democracy, but I am unhappy about the extent to which top-down decisions are imposed without adequate and informed discussion, and those hon. Members who are members of the executive committee will know how frustrating that is.

As for the budget, the appointment of vice-presidents to the international executive committee is supposed partly to address the need for an international IPU treasurer, as one of the vice-presidents would be in charge of overseeing the IPU's finances and accounts. The British group has been calling for that for a long time.

I remain sceptical about hitching the IPU wagon to the UN, particularly at the moment, because the UN has problems of its own, which it must address first. Those hon. Members who are on the IPU executive will know that such a move was proposed by the international IPU in Geneva, which is currently working to that end. However, parliamentarians may be better off making their views about the reforms that need to be undertaken at the UN known to their own Governments first. The suggestion made by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) may be one way forward. There is further debate to be had about reform of the IPU and the way forward for the British group, and I am sure that my successor and my colleagues will keep those and related issues under scrutiny.

I should thank the Foreign Office for its assistance during our many conferences and for its useful advice at specific times during our week-long debates in other countries. Annual Adjournment debates such as this have proved a useful tool in making colleagues, the Government and the wider world aware of what we do and what support is needed. I trust that they will remain a welcome fixture in the parliamentary calendar, although preferably not on a Thursday afternoon.

Although I am standing down as chair of the British group, I intend to remain fully active in the IPU and to support my colleagues as they continue to strengthen inter-parliamentary dialogue and to further what is perhaps the most important work that the IPU can do—protecting the rights of fellow parliamentarians around the world.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): The House thanks the right hon. Lady, the chairman of the British group, for her wide-ranging speech. I call the spokesman for Her Majesty's Opposition, Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown.

3.19 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): I thank you, Sir Nicholas, for chairing this debate, and it is a great pleasure to serve under you, particularly as you are a member of the IPU's executive. The right hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd) referred to your excellent work, and it would be quite wrong of me not to refer to all her excellent work during her three years as chairman. In that respect, I was delighted to hear her concluding remarks, although I had assumed as a matter of course that she would remain active in the IPU—if she did not, it would be a sad loss. Knowing her very sincere commitment to human rights, I know that that issue is dear to her heart, and that she will continue to fight for all those whose human rights are less well protected than our own.

"No one pretends that democracy is perfect or all-wise. Indeed, it has been said that democracy is the worst form of Government except all those other forms that have been tried from time to time".—[Official Report, 11 November 1947; Vol. 444, c. 206-7.]

That was, of course, said by the famous former Prime Minister, Sir Winston Churchill, in a speech in this House. We tend to take for granted, in this font of democracy in the United Kingdom, that parliamentarians can say what they like without fear or favour—without fear of being arrested when they leave the Chamber. The Government have made a pig's ear of Northern Rock and losing child benefit records, but I shall not be arrested when I leave the Chamber for having said so. We are free and able to say what we like without fear of persecution. That is a huge privilege that our people have fought for over centuries and that the right hon. Lady referred to time and again. It is up to us, who have a strong democratic tradition and democratic rights, to fight on behalf of people throughout the world who do not have that privilege.

Freedom under the rule of law, and freedom to have a Parliament and a fair press and fair media, are things that we all take for granted, but the right hon. Lady quoted many dreadful cases. I was delighted that she got a very strong resolution on Burma passed at the last IPU conference, particularly as she had generously let our motion on environmental changes drop, so as to obtain that topical and timely debate. It is shocking that Members of Parliament in that country have been arrested, tortured and beaten, that some have disappeared and that some have had to seek exile. There are other countries, such as Zimbabwe, where Members of Parliament suffer the same fate. It is unacceptable. As she said, where Members of Parliament are treated in an undemocratic and unfree way, that often transfers to how the country is governed throughout, and particularly to the operation of the media.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I apologise for my tardy arrival. I was in an evidence session of the Select Committee on International Development, to which I shall have to return in due course.

My hon. Friend has rightly focused on the bestial atrocities committed in Burma. Does he agree—I know that the right hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd) has been extremely robust on this point—that the situation in Burma, which affects citizens as much as parliamentarians who are denied their rightful legislative slot, underlines the importance of having such matters raised consistently and multilaterally in every conceivable forum by Ministers of the highest level in our Government? That sends a signal. Equally and conversely—although I intend no disrespect to the Minister for Europe—if those issues are raised only by more junior Ministers, that sends a negative signal.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Of course those issues need to be raised at the most senior level, when the most senior Ministers, from the Prime Minister downwards, visit the relevant countries, or neighbouring countries, such as, in Burma's case, China. That matter should be raised whenever a high-level visit is made to China. That would be helpful.

The right hon. Lady made a good point, which was echoed by my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans), about the fact that the IPU provides a useful forum for meetings between members of different Parliaments. That does not apply in Burma's case—it is impossible—but IPU members have met Chinese parliamentary members informally. If it can be stressed to them how appalling and unacceptable the situation is in their neighbouring country of Burma, the message does, over a period, reach those in charge of China. It is to be hoped that, after a time, it will bring about a change in China's attitude towards Burma. That has probably happened in relation to North Korea, as there has undoubtedly been a change in the Chinese Government's attitude towards the way the North Koreans are governed—or perhaps I should say misgoverned. I think that the relationship between North Korea and South Korea is beginning to thaw very slightly. Let us hope for the people of North Korea, who live under one of the most autocratic Governments on the planet, that that thaw will continue.

In paying tribute to the right hon. Lady, I want to include the staff and secretariat of the IPU. I was privileged to go on the outward visit to Mexico. The preparations for the visit were immaculate, the staff were extremely courteous and the whole visit ran very smoothly. I regret to say that it was not until I had been a Member of Parliament for 15 years that I went on that visit. Perhaps the right hon. Lady and other IPU executive committee members would reflect on how to raise awareness among all Members of Parliament—in particular, among those of my party, who, I am sorry to say, tend to be under-represented, perhaps because we are fewer in number than those in the Government party—of the importance of IPU visits and of its very good work.

Jeremy Corbyn: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that delegations should not only give a full report back after visits, as they are required to by IPU rules—I do not complain about that—but, where possible, link up with the appropriate all-party parliamentary groups, so that the great volume of information and knowledge that they collect, and demands for human rights action, can be given effect in Parliament? It does not help anyone when Members go on a visit and do little about it afterwards.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: The hon. Gentleman makes an extremely good point, which the right hon. Lady will no doubt have heard. As he knows, because I am sure he has been on such a visit, there is always a preparatory meeting. It would probably be appropriate to consider inviting the secretary of the relevant all-party group to the meeting so that he or she could contribute to the knowledge of colleagues going on the visit. That would be very beneficial. We received a full briefing from the Foreign Office, and our ambassador in Mexico was incredibly helpful during our visit. I am sure that that is true for many other visits.

As to the workings of the IPU, the right hon. Lady did not mention it, but it is a pity that the United States has become a non-paying member. As one of the world's most powerful democracies, it would be useful if it returned to the fold. Her annual report says that she is fed up with having to defend its interests, and wishes that it would do so for itself.

Ann Clwyd rose—

Mr. Clifton-Brown: No doubt the right hon. Lady wishes to make that point.

Ann Clwyd: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman mentioned that matter, because I was in Washington last week, where I raised it with people at the White House and in the State Department, and with our ambassador. I have done that on previous occasions, but I hope that it may bear fruit this time around. A vote on the matter was lost by, I think, one vote, last year, but it is essential that the United States rejoins the IPU. It withdrew rather a long time ago, and it is true that we have had to defend its interests from time to time. It should come and do that itself.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I am sure that the right hon. Lady's wise words and quiet counsels behind the scenes will have had an effect if anyone's could, and that, even if there is not a change of heart immediately, perhaps there will be one after next year's presidential elections. Let us hope so.

John Bercow: Far be it from me to wish to stoke up a controversy, but sometimes there is an important difference between having interests and having an interest. Whatever the norms and niceties of diplomatic protocol, if the IPU is to be as robust in the future as it has been under the leadership of the right hon. Member for Cynon Valley, we must never neglect—perhaps in the misguided name of courtesy and a quiet life—to raise human rights issues on our visits, or when receiving incoming delegations.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I agree. My hon. Friend puts the point from his customary robust stance. We can all be robust. The trick is to be robust at times and quietly diplomatic at others. On this issue, the right hon. Lady's approach on the United States was probably the right one, because if we took up megaphone diplomacy, it would probably back off. My hon. Friend is absolutely correct in the case of human rights: there is no point whatever in shirking from saying that human rights in countries such as Zimbabwe, Burma, Haiti—

Jeremy Corbyn: Saudi Arabia.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Yes, in some instances. If the facts about the Saudi Arabian case are as the right hon. Lady described—I do not doubt that they are—it is unacceptable for two reasons. First, the individual involved was the innocent party. Secondly, as I understand it from what she said, that individual's lawyer has also been arrested, which means that she will not get a fair trial. She has been judged guilty before the trial has begun. I hope that the Minister will say something about that in his winding-up speech, and about what representations the Government are making.

Countries such as Saudi Arabia are our great friends, but as my hon. Friend said, it is to our great friends that we should be able to say, from time to time, "What you are doing is unacceptable," just as I would tell the United States that what it is doing in Guantanamo Bay is unacceptable—at the risk of bringing controversy to the debate. I hope that for its own sake, and for the image of the United States, which has taken a huge battering, I hope that it dismantles Guantanamo Bay as soon as possible, because the rule of law should take a proper, open and accountable course, particularly in such a great democracy.

However, I was not briefed to say that today and I should like to get back to my script.

Mr. Evans: Our right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) is on the phone.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Perhaps I should go on an IPU outward visit. I should like to get back to my script before I get into further trouble.

My visit to Mexico was immaculately organised and such visits do much good. Mexico is a big country—one of 11 with a population of more than 100 million. It is therefore important, but it is not too widely known among the British people. It has a GDP per head of twice that of Brazil, which gets far more publicity. Mexico is an important emerging country. Some 18 cents in every $1 that the US spends abroad is spent in Mexico. It is a very fast-emerging country.

Of course, Mexico is heavily reliant on the United States, which is itself heavily reliant on Mexico. Some 7 million Mexicans live in the US, and I do not doubt that many of those will have a vote in next year's presidential elections. In states such as Florida, they will have a decisive effect on the result. The relationship between Mexico and America, particularly following the election of the conservative President Calderon, has become closer and warmer over the years. It is therefore important that we know what precisely is going on there and that we build contacts with Mexico's Parliament, which we did.

Equally, we found that Mexico had a great deal of good will towards Britain, and that it wanted to extend its relationships in Europe, and for Britain to be the spearhead of those. We live in a fast-changing world, and we do not always catch up with what is going on, but trading relationships with south-east Asia are moving quickly. It is a historical fact that Europe, and particularly this country because of its historical links, tends to look to the east to see south-east Asia. Increasingly, I believe that we will see those countries as being to our west, through the Panama canal. Countries such as Mexico and Colombia could well become stopping-off points for those trading activities.

Mexico is an important country, but it needs to emerge from a dirigiste economy, much of which is founded on public monopolies and private oligopolies. However, when it brings about some constitutional changes—for example, to liberalise its oil regime so that it can begin to explore deeper water in the gulf of Mexico and the Pacific—it will change quickly. We found great friendship among the Mexican people, and great expertise among their parliamentarians. That is a typical example of how the IPU's work benefits the country. The Minister made an excellent point when he said that the IPU is an added arm to Foreign Office diplomacy, and an additional level of contact. It is good to make contact with parliamentarians, particularly those who may become senior members of the Mexican Government.

Jeremy Corbyn: During the Mexico visit, did the delegation have any opportunity for either formal or informal discussions with representatives of the non-Spanish speaking indigenous peoples, of which there are many in the country, and/or representatives of Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador, the candidate who was declared not elected in the presidential elections last year? Whatever the hon. Gentleman's views on those people, both groups have important contributions to make and an important message to send.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. On a slightly jocular, if mainly serious note, there was a nude demonstration right outside Parliament the whole time we were there of indigenous peoples who had lost their land rights. I cannot believe that it failed to make an impression on Mexican parliamentarians and it struck a chord with us. We asked those parliamentarians what the demonstration was about, which will no doubt happen when other foreign people visit the Parliament. I would assume that the Government will eventually do something about it, but indigenous peoples have issues, not only in Mexico but in other countries, and I am hopeful that just solutions can be found. We were not, however, given any indication that that would happen when we were in Mexico.

A number of papers have been published and a number of issues raised on the broader aspects of the IPU's work, particularly in my field of international development. I am grateful that the IPU concentrated on peace, stability and good governance. Unfortunately, 1.2 billion people—around one fifth of the world population—live on less than $1 a day, as measured by equivalent purchasing power. One fifth of our fellow citizens live in abject poverty, in one way or another. It is incumbent on all of us to do something about that.

I am mildly critical of Governments of all colours, and internationally, on such matters. Kurt Hoffman, whom I have quoted on this figure in the House, said that over the past 20 years, the developing community has had some $400 billion of aid, and yet in the same period their average standard of living has dropped. The way in which we have disbursed aid has not been as effective as it might. One reason for that is that the worst Governments tend to be in the same areas as the worst human rights and the worst poverty.

I was pleased to see no less a figure than the Secretary of State for International Development announce in a debate last Thursday an additional £20 million for the globalisation and poverty fund, which takes it to £120 million, to encourage better government. We must all find ways, at every level, by negotiation, and by bilateral and multilateral aid, to encourage bad Governments to get better. However much help one gives, it is no good if people such as Mugabe and Field Marshal Than Shwe in Burma keep their people in unacceptable conditions. We must find ways to change such regimes.

When the right hon. Member for Cynon Valley was speaking, I reflected on whether she feels—I would be interested to know hon. Members' views on this—that democracy is on the march and increasing throughout the world, and whether, because the media have made events so much more immediate, dreadful cases such as Burma and Zimbabwe are brought much more to our attention than they used to be. I suspect that that probably is the case and that if people consider places where democracy is quietly on the increase, they will see that things are improving. I can think of examples such as Mozambique, which was a very war-torn country but now has democracy and is flourishing. Sierra Leone is another example. One tends to think of everything as doom and gloom, yet there are countries where things are getting better.

I was delighted to hear the right hon. Lady's comments on her work on the IPU's human rights committee. I was reflecting on the extent to which her work has been undertaken over a number of years and wondering what communication she has had with the new UN Human Rights Council based in Geneva. I am very concerned about that because I do not think that it has the teeth that it deserves. I wonder what we can all do to ensure that it has teeth. I am hopeful that the universal peer review mechanism will give it teeth, but I note that the countries that are being reviewed first are pretty benign countries such as ourselves, for which the review will not do much good. Perhaps the IPU, through its links with the UN, can prod the council into doing a little more.

The right hon. Lady raised a number of issues. The work of the IPU is of huge benefit. The way to encourage better human rights, better governance and relief of poverty is through trade. We need to encourage every possible aspect of trade. Negotiations are going on between the European Union and the African, Caribbean and Pacific countries. I have talked to some of the most senior Ministers in the ACP countries, some of which are among the smallest on the planet. Of course the very poorest—the low-income countries—already have full access to the European market through the "Everything but Arms" negotiations. It is the level above that—the 76 countries currently in that negotiating mechanism—whose interests are not being considered by the British Government as much as they might be.

The negotiation is unequal. We are talking about the full might of the European Commission, with all its expertise, albeit that is negotiating with the six groups. Nevertheless, the capacity of some very small countries to negotiate such agreements is not great. More than any other country in the European Union, Britain, with its historical links, has a prime duty to ensure that the interests of those countries are protected, by which I do not mean that the trade preference system should be continued. This country does, however, have a duty to conduct proper impact assessments, or ensure that the EU has conducted proper impact assessments, so that the full impact of the damage to the economies of those countries—the loss of jobs—is known.

I shall use an example that I have used before. I met some Seychelles Members of Parliament the other day. The Seychelles have only 88,000 people, yet they reckon that if the economic partnership agreements go through in their current form, they will lose their entire tuna canning factory business to Thailand—a lower-cost producer—with the loss of several hundred jobs. That does not sound much, but if we translate from the size of their population up to the size of our population—60 million—we realise the very considerable impact that the negotiations will have on those economies.

We will have a debate on the subject in this Chamber next week, but the Minister's Department and the Department for International Development are heavily involved in the issue. Before he agrees that the Commission should sign the agreements, which have to be signed by 31 December, please can we ensure that there are proper impact assessments? Once those assessments have been conducted and we can see what damage will be done, can we ensure that there is a guaranteed package of international help in place from the EU to cushion the transition for those countries?

This is an interesting debate. As the right hon. Lady said, it is a pity that it is taking place on a Thursday, but the work of the IPU, through all colleagues in the House and through the secretariat, is to be greatly commended. I shall finish where I started—with a quote from a famous politician:

> "When bad men combine, the good must associate; else they will fall one by one, an unpitied sacrifice in a contemptible struggle."

Of course that is from "Thoughts on the Cause of the Present Discontents".

John Bercow: Burke—a great man.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Sir Edmund Burke, one of our former great politicians.

Jeremy Corbyn: He was a dreadful parliamentarian.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I have had a certain amount of barracking, but it is all part of good parliamentary democracy that we can disagree with one another and yet at the same time remain fundamentally committed to our cause, which is the advancement of the human condition right across the planet and the elimination of all the negative things that we have talked about. I am grateful to have taken part in the debate.

Several hon. Members rose—

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): Order. Before I call the Liberal Democrat spokesman, I remind hon. Members that we shall finish at 5.30 pm and, because there will be many points to reply to and it is important that the Minister gets a good innings, I would like to give him 20 minutes. Many others want to speak, so I ask hon. Members to exercise an element of self-discipline. I am not necessarily relating the last remark to the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mark Hunter).

3.46 pm

Mark Hunter (Cheadle) (LD): That is very kind of you, Sir Nicholas. It is a particular pleasure for me to have the opportunity of participating in the debate, not just because you are a near constituency neighbour of mine, but because of your own long-standing and personal interest in the matters that we are discussing.

I also pay tribute to and congratulate the right hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd), who made a very comprehensive and detailed contribution to the debate. She went through a number of the highlights of the work of the British group, which she has chaired so diligently, of the Inter-Parliamentary Union. Many other Members present are members of the IPU and I look forward to their contributions on that excellent organisation and the work that it has undertaken over the past 12 months in particular.

The role of the IPU is vital for three key reasons. First, we obviously live in an increasingly interdependent world where many issues can and probably should only be tackled supranationally or internationally. In that environment, connecting national Parliaments to allow them to co-ordinate their work and share ideas is particularly important. The IPU facilitates inter-parliamentary efforts in many policy areas, including international peace and security and sustainable development, about which we have heard much already.

The IPU is particularly well known, however, for its work on human rights. I shall give a couple of examples that I think are worth noting in the context of this debate. This year, the IPU reported on the justice system in Panama. It also teamed up with UNICEF to publish a report on violence against children. As an organisation, the IPU is uniquely placed to investigate and demand action on human rights abuses. It will often have at its disposal the support not only of representatives from the national Parliament of the country in question, but the experience and expertise of elected representatives from all over the world, some of whom will have dealt with similar problems in their own countries.

The IPU's work is not confined to human rights, however. I especially congratulate the IPU on the work of its advisory group on HIV/AIDS and its efforts to co-ordinate the world's legislatures in the fight against the AIDS pandemic. I understand that the group will be taking part in the first global parliamentary meeting on HIV/AIDS in the Philippines at the end of this month. I sincerely hope that the joint discussions taking place there will allow the representatives to share best practice and work together in this most vital of areas.

The second vital role of the IPU is to fill what many have termed the democratic deficit. The introduction of supranational organisations such as the UN, the EU, the World Trade Organisation and the World Health Organisation means that the decisions most relevant to individuals are often taken at a level where there is little direct democratic accountability. National Parliaments' involvement in international issues through the IPU allows the people's directly elected representatives access and influence on crucial matters. I was extremely pleased that this year's parliamentary hearing at the UN is the first to be organised as a joint event with the IPU, and that the IPU plans to set up a special committee on UN affairs, albeit on a trial basis. That shows how closely the two organisations can and should work together.

Parliaments must have a key role in the UN and must co-ordinate with it if international problems are to be resolved satisfactorily. One of the biggest challenges facing the world today is that many international issues such as development, human rights and climate change can be dealt with only by using co-ordinated strategies. Many Governments, agencies and organisations of all kinds are doing their best individually to tackle such problems, which is of course extremely laudable and should be encouraged, but every organisation must consider how it can interact with others in the same field and whether they can be stronger and have more influence by co-operating, while avoiding reinventing the wheel.

I am pleased to see developed co-operation between the IPU and the UN on a range of projects and issues, and would very much like to see the IPU working more formally with other organisations, such as the EU. The EU has a vital role to play in development, international peace and security and human rights, and it can only benefit from a closer working relationship with the IPU. Will the Minister tell us how often he or the Government meet with representatives of the IPU, and whether he is aware of any programme of interaction between the IPU and the EU?

The IPU also has a role to play in spreading and improving democracy throughout the world by sharing best practice between national Parliaments, encouraging burgeoning democracies and promoting human rights. By being a focal point of worldwide parliamentary dialogue, the IPU allows national Parliaments the opportunity to promote democracy throughout the world without imposing it. For example, the British group has taken part in 16 inward and outward delegations so far in 2007, as the right hon. Member for Cynon Valley described. Through such visits, parliamentarians can spread their influence—in the form of best practice on scrutiny, procedures, good governance and election oversight—as well as engaging in discussions on how best to interact and work with citizens and civil society.

I know from my own experience of meeting fellow parliamentarians from emerging democracies that such contact is incredibly important. Not only do they appreciate advice and support from Members of this House, they are grateful for encouragement, especially as for many the road to democracy is fraught with trouble and, in some cases, great individual danger. As we know, Iraq is struggling to establish itself as a democracy. Will the Minister inform the Chamber whether he has met IPU representatives to discuss how we might seek to improve democracy and human rights in Iraq?

I am not saying that our own system is perfect; far from it. Britain has much to learn from our partners in the IPU, especially in matters of representation of women and ethnic minorities to make our voting system truly representative. It is a sad fact that fewer than 20 per cent. of the seats in the House of Commons are held by women. Frankly, it is a pretty dismal record that reflects badly on all of us. We could certainly learn a lot from Parliaments around the world about promoting gender equality. I notice from my research for today's debate that the female composition of the lower chamber in Parliaments as far apart as Rwanda and Sweden is nearly 50 per cent. Has the Minister had any discussions with the IPU about the issue or used its vast stock of knowledge and experience to improve the representation of women in this place?

The hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) referred to the continued absence of the United States of America from the IPU. I am astonished that despite the fact that the IPU boasts 146 member Parliaments and seven associate member nations, the USA is not currently one of them. It is extremely disappointing. The US's reason, if that is what it is, appears to be that it has simply allowed its subscription to lapse. I am afraid I am probably not the only person in this House to think that that tells us a lot about the Bush Administration's views on foreign policy issues. Has the Minister discussed the matter with any representative of the US Government or had the chance to point out what a great help the US might be to newly established democracies around the world?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: It is a little bit unfair of the hon. Gentleman to blame the Bush Administration's foreign policy for American non-participation in the IPU. If there were enough of a push from Congressmen and Senators, I am certain that the US would become a member. Also, it is not a recent development. I understand that it has been the case for some years, so the current regime is not necessarily solely responsible.

Mark Hunter: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention, but it is incumbent on the current Government, if they believe that there is a wrong, to put it right. How to do so is fairly obvious. What I actually said was that it says a lot about the Bush Administration's views on foreign policy; I did not use the words that the hon. Gentleman used.

One of the matters on which the IPU spends considerable time is safeguarding fellow parliamentarians' human rights. Parliamentarians have a mandate to represent the people of their countries, but to do so effectively they need to be able to do their job without persecution or threat of imprisonment or violence. Without such freedom, democracy cannot function: representatives are unable to speak out, hold Governments accountable for their actions or raise many of the issues that their constituents might wish them to. Ensuring free speech for politicians is a vital first step in embedding democracy and human rights in a country. It is shocking how many cases of human rights abuses against elected representatives still occur. I congratulate the IPU on its continued and excellent work on that issue. I understand that during its July session alone, the IPU's committee on the human rights of parliamentarians examined public cases concerning 198 legislators in 18 countries—a shocking figure.

This year the IPU has continued its excellent campaign in Burma, calling for the release of elected MPs jailed by the country's ruling military junta. Will the Minister tell us whether the Government have worked with the IPU on that issue during this difficult time for Burma, and whether there is any sign that the situation there is improving?

Finally, as a Liberal politician I believe strongly in the need to talk to our neighbours and to establish dialogue with them, even when we disagree, as it is the best way for conflicts to be resolved. It is to the IPU's great credit that it gives national Parliaments the opportunity to do so. By encouraging us to talk and work together on a variety of issues, by improving the democratic nature of international politics, and by encouraging democracy across the globe, the IPU plays a vital role in today's changing world. I congratulate it, and I hope that it will be able to continue its good work long into the future.

Mrs. Madeleine Moon (Bridgend) (Lab): I pray your indulgence, Sir Nicholas, but as I explained to you at an earlier meeting this week when we received a report from the IPU delegation to Albania, I am still suffering from "Groganitis", a particularly virulent infection that one can catch from the leader of the IPU delegation, after whom the condition is named.

Since becoming a Member of the House in 2005, I have become ever more aware of the fact that while there is a general lack of understanding among constituents of the range of tasks and responsibilities that fall to a Member of Parliament, people are generally cynical about and have a limited knowledge of our involvement with other Parliaments and Governments. They tend to see such involvement and such visits as a jolly, as something that is undertaken lightly—a way of getting out of Westminster and of travelling the world.

At some point, we need to use debates such as this about the role, the depth and the importance of the Inter-Parliamentary Union to explain to our constituents how vital that work is, and to explain that the dialogues that have been mentioned this afternoon are crucial to raising the development of women, to promoting the role of civil society in many countries, and especially to supporting developing democracies and opening up and tackling many of the issues that they find difficult.

Today, I want to consider how my experience in Albania—a small and relatively unknown country—reflects the critical world role that the IPU is playing. I went there this year with five others; the delegation was cross-party, which is itself an important aspect of the work of the IPU as it provides more than just one representation of how democracy works or what it can encompass. It allows other countries to see that the different parties in this place can work together, share ideas and even conflict without things breaking down into animosity and civil war. It is a very important message that we take with us.

The IPU visit was the first official delegation from the United Kingdom to Albania. The aim was to create bilateral contact as part of the IPU's cornerstone activity, the pursuit of worldwide parliamentary dialogue for the furtherance of peace and co-operation—and, I would add, education and understanding. I last visited Albania in 1996 as a representative of Aid in Action, an organisation set up in my constituency by Father Cashin. It aimed to reach out to two communities—Kruje and Rubic, one Muslim and one Catholic—to create a dialogue to improve their quality of life and to demonstrate that the west had an interest in that new democracy and in the people.

That involvement continued until my visit to Albania in October this year, and it ended with an Albanian Minister being handed a £40,000 study: a hydrological assessment of the river Fani. I hope that that study will bring Albania greater electricity supplies and greater economic development. I hope that it will give the communities around the river Fani greater capacity for a programme of economic development, which is currently impossible because of the lack of electricity in the country.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I would be most interested to know the hon. Lady's impression of the situation in Albania. Under Enver Hoxha, it was one of the most closely controlled communist regimes in the world, and it contained some of the world's poorest people. Is her overall impression of an improving regime, with better prospects for the people of that country, or is it too early to say?

Mrs. Moon: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. My visit in 1996 was a deeply distressing and depressing experience. The quality of the hospitals and schools that I visited was dire. I met people from the newly formed political parties there, and we discussed how to promote dialogue in a country that had never experienced it and that had never known the capacity to have a debate that allowed more than one opinion. That, for them, was unique, and they were struggling to come to terms with it.

Albania in 2007 shows greater prosperity, and certainly the concept of dialogue and of differences being tolerated has grown. However, there are still problems, as I hope to explain. Our trip came at an important time for Albania's progress towards becoming a fully fledged, modern democratic country. Only recently, our Parliament ratified the European Union standardisation and association agreement with Albania. That was critical for Albania. Two of the goals on the path towards democracy are entering the EU and NATO.

Despite its poverty, and despite its many, many problems, Albania has sought to play a major part in the world. It has sent troops to Iraq and to Afghanistan. It has tried to demonstrate its desire for dialogue and engagement with world problems, and to move forward. In early 2008, at Bucharest, it hopes that its request for entry to NATO will be considered.

These discussions are important. They are essential in aiding Albania in its journey on the difficult road towards democratic accountability, good governance and transparency. If we do not have these discussions, if we do not raise these difficult questions, it makes that road so much more difficult to tread for countries such as Albania.

It is also important for countries such as Albania, which have no track record, no history of individual or media freedom and no capacity to have an opinion outside that of the state, to develop those processes. While we were there, we met a group called MJAFT, the principal civil rights organisation in Albania. It is characterised by a new generation of well-educated Albanians, who are determined to create open dialogue, in which criticism and accountability will be central. I was most impressed with what we saw there, and with the desire to move the country forward. As we know, it is never easy to be criticised or to be held to account, but it is one of the central tenets of democracy—and Albania is embracing it.

We visited a trafficked women's rehabilitation centre outside Tirana. We were advised that although trafficking of Albanian women had virtually ceased, there was still both an historic problem and one of women in transit. As we know, Britain is a destination for transited women; 4,000 women are known to have been transited into the UK, and 150 have come to Wales.

We in Wales are sometimes content to think that the world's wider issues pass us by, and to believe that we live in a very comfortable and closed world of villages and close-knit communities. However, when a brothel of whose existence many people in my constituency did not even know was raided by the police in Operation Pentameter, it emerged that there were women in the brothel who had been brought into the country for sexual exploitation. We cannot ignore such issues in our communities. They are an essential part of the IPU's work. We should bring them to the attention of our constituents so that they understand that not only are we working on them at every level but that their importance is also being conveyed to our counterparts around the world at every level.

I was impressed by the Albanians' national strategy for combating trafficking of human beings. Again, from a world of poverty, they are attempting to tackle issues that impact greatly on their country, in relation to organised crime. Criminality is a central problem that Albania must tackle.

The IPU is the focal point for worldwide parliamentary dialogue. It works for peace and co-operation among peoples and for the firm establishment of representative democracy. That work is critical to Albania. As has been mentioned, Albania emerged at the start of the 1990s from the destructive grip of one of the most authoritarian and undemocratic political regimes in Europe. That legacy made it difficult to establish political stability and respect for government and the rule of law. Albania remains the poorest country in Europe. At present, only 20 per cent. of the population live below the national poverty line of $2 a day. It is that sector of the population that suffers most from the lack of access to basic services such as education, water, and health and social assistance.

As I have said, Albania has made impressive progress. The pyramid savings scandal in 1997 wiped out 60 per cent. of the country's private savings and plunged it further into poverty. The collapse of the scheme caused widespread destruction of infrastructure. Guns became widely available. The country is still struggling to recover and regain the lost ground.

Despite Albania being the most isolated country in Europe, its Parliament has not benefited from any structured programme of assistance since the beginning of democratic change. Nevertheless, it has sought to play an international and humanitarian role, in particular in relation to Kosovo, which is especially relevant at present as on 10 December we shall be considering the future role of that country. At a time of huge poverty, Albania opened its borders and took in refugees. Far from seeking to deny its responsibilities, it sought to act responsibly at a time when Europe was yet again plunging into holocaust. We should recognise that Albania has clearly attempted to fulfil its human rights obligations.

Albanian parliamentarians have faced difficulties in fulfilling their legislative oversight and representational functions. Without the necessary financial support for the relevant infrastructure, it is difficult for a Parliament to remain honest and transparent and to avoid corruption seeping into democracy. Visits from organisations such as the IPU will help achieve progress in that respect.

A legacy of the extended period of Stalinist oppression has been public suspicion of and lack of confidence in government as an ally or effective provider of services. Successive Governments have had only a decade to adapt both to democratic norms and market economics and to gain the trust of the people. It is right that there is wide acceptance within the country that Albania's future is as part of a democratic Europe. Albania joining Europe is about changing attitudes, about the ordinary Albanian's belief and trust in democracy, and about a wider European peace. Past European history has demonstrated how instability in the Balkans can have a huge effect on peace in Europe.

In my short time in this House, one of the things that has frightened me most has been how little many of our young people know of the long road that brought this country to democracy, of how the House works, and of why we conduct our business as we do. If people do not understand democracy, it is so much easier for them to lose it. So many people take this country's human and civil rights for granted—rights towards which Albania is still working. Let me list some issues: religious and sexual freedom; promotion of children's rights; disabled people's rights; the status of women; press freedom; the rule of law; an independent judiciary; freedom from arbitrary arrest and imprisonment; parliamentary processes of accountability; good governance and transparency; the development of civil society; economic development; and access to health and education. Dialogue on those matters is central to the work of the IPU, and that is why our work with the IPU is among the most important that we undertake. It is sad that that work remains hidden from the general public.

Christine Russell (City of Chester) (Lab): Let me begin with my own tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd), who has shown excellent leadership of the British branch of the IPU during the past three years. For a long time—ever since she was a Member of the European Parliament—I have admired the way in which she has championed human rights around the world.

Let me also take this opportunity to pay tribute to the work of Ken Courtenay—he is not here today—and of his hard-working staff. In the past 12 months I have been able to take part in an outward delegation and also in a number of inward delegations. The energy and commitment shown by the London IPU staff is tremendous. They work some very antisocial hours, and we should record our thanks to them.

The IPU is the parliament of Parliaments, and it is as relevant today as when it was first founded 118 or so years ago. Whether we live in the developed or the developing world, 21st century issues such as globalisation, climate change, energy security, mass migration, conflict, and the fact that well over 1 billion people in the world still live in dire poverty affect us all. A great strength of the IPU is that it gives us an opportunity for dialogue on those important issues with our fellow parliamentarians from around the world.

I have been crossing out in my notes several of the comments that I intended to make, because other hon. Members have covered them and I am aware of the time and that other hon. Members who are present may wish to contribute. Another great strength of the IPU is its role in improving parliamentary democracies and promoting good governance and the rule of law around the world.

My first involvement in an IPU activity was back in 1998, I think, when, as a new girl, I took part in a delegation to Guatemala, which was only just emerging from many years of civil war. The delegation was concerned that it would have to ask probing questions—sensitively—about continuing human rights abuses, which it did. We met some very brave politicians, not in formal meetings but by allowing them entry through the back door of our hotel at 6 am so that we could hear first-hand about the abuses still being perpetrated on parliamentarians. My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) made a very important point: when we return from such outward delegations, we have a responsibility to stay in touch and follow them up. In fact, I am still in touch with one of those brave female politicians whom I met 10 years ago. I recently sent her a dossier on the improvements to our legislation on domestic violence.

I recall another significant IPU event—the 2001 assembly in Marrakesh—when I think that our chairman, my right hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley, had just been appointed to the IPU human rights committee. We were without her during the very long hours of our plenary sessions, because she was attending hearings of the human rights committee. That assembly was significant because it sat in the immediate aftermath of the terrorist attacks on New York and Washington. As hon. Members will know, the United States and the United Kingdom follow each other alphabetically. I was really impressed by the number of members of delegations from all around the world who expressed their condolences to us, because they thought that we were members of the US delegation—we happened to be sitting next to where they should have been sitting. I was appalled: I thought that if the Americans were serious about making friends and influencing people, they should have attended that assembly.

I think that the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) may agree that, increasingly, football is becoming the international language of diplomacy. That is probably an inappropriate thing to say after last night. Nevertheless, I recall arriving in Marrakesh and, as other members of the delegation checked in, looking at the big screen and seeing that Manchester United was playing West Ham. I rested for a few minutes to watch the match and was joined by a group of fans, who turned out to be members of the Libyan delegation.

Our initial conversation about the achievements of Beckham and Giggs developed into a broader conversation, and the next day we met again. That was significant because it was, I think, one of the first contacts between UK and Libyan representatives, at a time when the Libyans were still subject to UN sanctions; Libya was a pariah state. It was quite clear to us that there was a serious wish on the part of the Libyans to restore diplomatic relations with the UK in particular; of course, we dutifully got that message through loud and clear to the Foreign Office on our return to Britain. When such delegations return home, or following really good dialogue with parliamentarians on inward delegations, it is important that we convey such messages, whether to the Foreign

[Christine Russell]

Office, the Department for International Development or individual Ministers, to the British Council or to other relevant bodies.

This year I joined an IPU delegation to Jordan, which as hon. Members will know is in a very precarious location in the middle east, surrounded as it is by Iraq, the west bank, Syria and Lebanon. The former king, His Majesty King Hussein, played a key role in brokering the peace agreement between the Israelis and the Palestinians in the 1990s. There are, of course, many similarities and close ties between Jordan and the UK: both are constitutional monarchies and, as a number of Jordanian parliamentarians pointed out, our upper Houses are both appointed, not elected.

The visit was immensely worth while. I was so impressed by the amount of time that the Prime Minister, Dr. Marouf al-Bakhit, the Foreign Minister, and other politicians gave to meeting the delegation. He hot-footed it back from an Arab League conference in Cairo for a few hours and then returned to Cairo. I am sure that the Minister will have heard the key message that in the view of the Jordanians and, I suspect, most other countries in the middle east, there will be no peace in the region, nor security in the world, until there is a lasting peace between the Palestinians and Israelis. Interestingly, we also heard an extolment of the European Union, which I had not expected. The Foreign Minister pointed out to us that it was easier for Jordan to trade with Britain than with its neighbours and that Jordan views the EU as an ideal model for economic development throughout the middle east, which I thought was an interesting observation.

In recent years, the IPU has become increasingly concerned and interested in environmental issues and refugee problems. In Jordan, we were given a good insight into how those issues are impacting on a relatively small country with few natural resources. Following on from the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mrs. Moon), I hasten to add that on my return everyone asked, "How was Petra?", and I said, "We did not go to Petra." This was not a tourist trip, but five days of jolly hard work and wall-to-wall meetings. However, we went on two excursions out of Amman, one of which was to the Dead sea. Sometimes, one must see with one's own eyes the environmental impact of what is happening. To see the Dead sea, which has shrunk by more than 30 per cent. probably in no more than 30 years, was a real revelation. We also heard about the immensely ambitious and costly plans to pipe water, which is desperately needed, not only for agricultural use but for drinking water for the Jordanians, from the Red sea all the way up to the Dead sea. I am sure that our Government will be called on to support that plan in a forum such as the World Bank.

We also heard about refugees. Jordan has accepted thousands of refugees from Iraq. I think that it may be more than a million; we could not get a definite answer as to whether it was 500,000, 1 million or 1.5 million. It was interesting to know that those refugees have tended to be quite wealthy or desperately poor. The wealthy ones are getting blamed for pushing up house prices in Amman, so Jordanians cannot afford to buy houses in their capital city, but all those who are living in dire poverty are a real drain on the public services in Jordan.

Although initially it was not going to be included in our programme, we insisted—we were right to do so—on visiting Hiteen refugee camp, where there are 45,000 Palestinians. The older ones have been in that refugee camp since 1967 and at the moment they have very little hope of ever leaving it. I have visited refugee camps in Gaza and the west bank and the conditions at Hiteen are probably better than those in Gaza. Even so, those 45,000 refugees have a life of dire poverty and misery.

As the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mark Hunter) said, we must recognise when we meet delegations or go on delegations, that our mature democracy has evolved over centuries. We should never be judgmental. I always apologise for the poor representation of women in our Parliament, but then I say that, actually, when my mother was born, women in Britain did not have the right to vote. It is only in the past 80 years that women have achieved equal rights. It is important that we try to include in our programmes the opportunity to meet women parliamentarians. If, as is so often the case in the Arab world, such women do not exist, I always make the point of saying, "Well, could we please meet women from civil society and opinion formers?" Nowadays, in most countries, as we found in Jordan, women are holding key jobs in education, health and banking, although they may not have a high profile in politics.

There are a couple of other messages that I would like to pass on. It is important for us to appear at least to be a bit more representative than we are and for our delegations to have a good gender balance. Certainly, the delegation to Jordan that I went on has a good 50:50 gender balance, but a number of delegations are all male. That does not convey a good message. There are 880 members of the IPU in our two Houses of Parliament. I am not sure what the gender breakdown is, but perhaps we should do a little bit more to get a few more women parliamentarians to come forward and go on visits.

Finally, I want to plug three great British institutions, starting first with the British Council. I have to declare an interest because my first paid job was with the British Council so I have retained an interest in its work. In the days when I worked for the British Council, we spent most of our time promoting high British—actually, English—culture. I never cease to be amazed and impressed by the quality of the work that our British Council offices do around the world: it is tremendous and is focused on key priorities, such as good governance and equality. That is superb work.

Secondly, I have yet to meet a fellow parliamentarian, whether from Africa, Asia or South America, who does not make a point of saying how much they appreciate and value the BBC World Service. Long may that continue.

Thirdly, I should like to mention the Chevening programme of scholarships. I hope that the Minister is listening, because if we can find the means, we need to expand and extend that programme. A number of countries feel slightly aggrieved because they value those scholarships so much, and over recent years fewer of their students have been able to come here and benefit from the advantages offered by higher education in Britain.

If Britain wants to retain a leading role and influence in the world, we have not only to sustain those three great institutions but to promote even more to our fellow parliamentarians the great role that the IPU can play in the world today.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): It is a pleasure to say a few words in this important debate on the IPU. I, too, pay tribute to Ken Courtenay and the staff of the IPU for their dedication and commitment. To follow a theme set by the hon. Member for City of Chester (Christine Russell), if it were not for the women working in the United Kingdom branch of the IPU, the IPU would grind to a halt. We pay tribute to the IPU's work.

The right hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd) has had praise poured and heaped on her, and rightly so. She has shown her usual dextrous skills in leading the IPU for the past three years. Her expertise on human rights and the middle east has held the United Kingdom delegation in good stead in many assemblies, meetings and sub-committee meetings of the IPU internationally. We are grateful for her expertise and for the work that she has done on our behalf, so I thank her for that.

I shall pick up on the three issues mentioned by the hon. Member for City of Chester at the end of her speech, because I was going to say something about them. The British Council is superb. Going on outward delegations normally gives us an opportunity to visit the British Council, wherever it happens to be. In some cases, that may be the only visit from parliamentarians that it gets and at which it can display the organisation's worth.

I was once in Greece and could not work out what a huge queue of young people was doing outside a hotel. I thought that perhaps they were queuing for some form of Greek "X Factor", but they were doing British Council exams. We should not forget the worth and popularity of the British Council throughout the world. I have been privileged to see its work in a number of countries and think it does a fantastic job, not just in underdeveloped parts of the world, but in fairly well-developed areas. Its encouragement for people learning English is important.

We are in a competitive world. The United States has come in for a bit of a kicking, but it does a lot to get its message across throughout the world. My goodness, the British Council sells our universities well! We are a competing with Australia and the United States, and it does a superb job.

The hon. Lady mentioned the Chevening scholarships, and in a small way, I shall show their worth. We took a delegation to Colombia, where we met President Uribe. We do not always meet Presidents when we go on delegation visits, because the most important thing is parliamentarian-to-parliamentarian communication, but on that occasion we worked out that President Uribe is a Chevening scholar. He spent more than an hour with our delegation, and one could still see and hear his enthusiasm for, and memories of, the time that he spent on his Chevening scholarship. I am therefore a doughty fighter for that organisation; it has great worth, particularly when we can meet future leaders of countries and get them into the United Kingdom, so that they gain a better understanding of us, and on returning to their country think more friendly thoughts about us. It is as simple as that, but it works, so three cheers for the Chevening scholarships.

The hon. Lady is absolutely right about the BBC World Service. People throughout the world listen to the BBC on the radio, and increasingly, where they have access to television, they can watch the BBC World Service, too. It is superb, and I hope that we can continue to support that aspect of the BBC in its excellent work.

Mrs. Moon: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one of the frightening things that one hears on delegations is how many people throughout the world have risked their lives listening to the BBC, because they see it as the only source of truth and honesty from which they can find out what is going on in the wider world? It has been banned for opening up people's minds to ideas and to the desperate need for change in their countries.

Mr. Evans: My hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) mentioned Burma, and the hon. Lady is right. When people seek the truth, they will go to almost any extent, including risking their lives, to access it. When I tried to access the BBC's website from China earlier this year, many pages had been blocked. That was a great shame, and I hope that the Chinese authorities reconsider that policy, particularly in the run-up to the Olympics next year. Do they really expect to keep one aspect of the press hidden from the people of China when they open their arms to people from throughout the world? I hope that the authorities think long and hard about that aspect of Chinese life, and I hope also that the Minister will be able to use his good offices to influence the Chinese Government.

The United States has come in for a kicking, and when we turn up to meetings, some delegates—in particular, those from Venezuela at our previous meeting—waste no opportunity to kick the United States, and sometimes it is left to the United Kingdom to say, "Hold on, you're being a bit unfair." However, it would be useful if the USA played a full role in the Inter-Parliamentary Union. I do not blame George W. Bush, but he has not made the situation any better during the period that he has been President of the United States. However, as my hon. Friend said, Congressmen should use their influence to ensure that they become full members of the IPU. They do not have to wait another 12 months, but I hope that whoever occupies the White House after the presidential elections ensures that the US is properly represented at the IPU. It would do their Congressmen the power of good to welcome the delegations that we receive through the IPU, and to attend the outward delegations that we have experienced, and about which we have heard. It is vital to go to countries—developing countries in particular—that one would not otherwise visit to talk informally and sometimes formally with members of Parliament. Congressmen would get an eye-opener.

We went to Gabon one year and, after talking to its politicians and looking around the country, the one thing I came away with was an idea of what the Chinese are up to there. They are active in Gabon, by providing international aid and constructing its parliamentary building, and it opens many doors for them. Gabon's resources are valuable to a growing economy like China's, and it is not the only example. If Congressmen were full members of the IPU, they would see more fully what is going on there.

[Mr. Evans]

The other important factor is inward delegations. We received one from Burundi last year. I shall leave it to the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) to discuss his recent outward delegation, but I hope that he will refer to football, as it was mentioned earlier, and to the good aspects of the visit, such as the footballs that he gave to the young, poor people of Burundi. Football is a diplomatic tool: we have very good relations with Croatia, for instance, after last night.

Jeremy Corbyn: We used to.

Mr. Evans: No. We have had good relations with Croatia, but I suspect that they love us at the moment. I am not too sure how huge a diplomatic tool football can be, but the hon. Member for City of Chester is right: when we talk to people from abroad, whatever their favourite football team, Manchester United tend to be high on their list.

Last week, Sir Nicholas, you will remember that we received an inward delegation from Cuba, and again, many Members do not have the opportunity to talk to MPs from that country. Members' visits to Cuba are perhaps not as good as they could be, although there is a very strong all-party Cuba group. I hope that we can facilitate more dialogue between Cuban parliamentarians and ourselves. We have already made many inroads on health, so there are good bilateral relations between the United Kingdom and Cuba. I hope also that we can use our influence over the United States to question why the Cuban embargo still exists. The logic really does defy me; it went out of the window a long time ago, and proper relations would benefit not only the United States and Cuba, but the world.

The right hon. Member for Cynon Valley mentioned Iran. One bilateral meeting that we had at the previous full IPU assembly was with some Iranian MPs, and she mentioned one case that we raised with them about two young lads who were hanged after they were accused of being gay. The conversation was surreal to say the least, because there was an attempt to defend the action. Much has been said about the educative aspects of the IPU, but goodness me, didn't I get an education that day? I am not too sure, however, whether there was any education the other way around. I find it hard even to begin to think that parliamentarians could defend the public execution off the back of a lorry of two young lads because they were accused of being gay. At one point, an Iranian MP said, "What they do in private is up to them, but if it is done publicly, they will be tortured." I said, "Tortured? They were executed," although I suspect they were tortured first. It is unacceptable for such things to take place in this day and age. A public execution in any event is fairly barbaric, but to do so because those men were accused of being gay is numbing.

That was not the only subject raised at the assembly, and I am delighted that the right hon. Lady raised several issues about the maltreatment of women in Iran, which takes place simply because they do not abide by the dress code that is imposed on them. We were grateful for the opportunity to discuss that. The IPU a year earlier sent a delegation to Iran to talk to its parliamentarians. I was not sure whether it was the right thing to do, but looking at the issue in the round, I think that parliamentarians talking to parliamentarians and trying to get our message across must be better than turning our backs on them. If we continue at least some form of dialogue with the Iranian parliamentarians, they might stand aside from the regime from time to time, and that is the important thing. When we go abroad and talk to parliamentarians, we are not there to defend or represent our Government; we talk to them about what we do and the issues that we deal with, and they respond to us in the same way. It is important to carry on with such dialogue.

Another important matter is the specialist work that we do on HIV and AIDS. The hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) is our specialist on that. He chairs the all-party group on AIDS, and as we speak we are being represented at an international seminar on the issue by the hon. Member for South Ribble (Mr. Borrow). Those two Members have taken a keen interest in the subject. For goodness' sake, we know that HIV and AIDS attack developing countries in particular in the most monstrous way, depleting their most economically active work force and robbing young children of their parents. Millions of orphans throughout the world have been denied their parents because of HIV and AIDS, and either their grandparents or the children themselves have to go to work simply to get their families through the day. It is important that we try to get the message across to parliamentarians about how they can better ensure that their Governments treat the issue seriously. Some Governments are clearly either in denial or not taking it as seriously as they might.

The No. 1 issue—climate change—was properly debated at our last assembly meeting. I can therefore understand why the right hon. Lady felt able to give way on the climate change debate at the Geneva conference so that we could put an emergency, urgent resolution on Burma at the top of the agenda. I am glad that she did so. As parliamentarians, we are all horrified to see what has happened in Burma—the degradation of relationships between the hideous regime and its people, the elected representatives and monks. A society cannot be allowed to turn weapons on monks who are peacefully protesting about the appalling economic conditions under which the people live or to lock away democratically elected politicians, in many cases under house arrest—Aung San Suu Kyi is a perfect, iconic example—or for a long duration in solitary confinement.

One of the more important aspects of our role is how MPs themselves—parliamentarians in this country—can stand up for the rights of other parliamentarians throughout the world who find themselves at the boot end of a regime of dictatorship operating in their country. Long may we continue to be able to stand up in this Parliament and negotiate with other parliamentarians to get their freedom, so that they can speak in their Parliaments with the same freedom that we enjoy in this one.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): Before I call the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), I think that he is aware that we want to try to give the Minister about 20 minutes to respond to the debate. I call Jeremy Corbyn.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): I have done a semaphore exchange with the Minister, and we have reached agreement. I always seek to reach agreement with my own Front Benchers, as he will be well aware. Sometimes, sadly, these things are beyond all of us, but we try.

I welcome the debate and thank my right hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd) for her introduction and her work as chairman. I add my thanks to all the staff of the IPU in London for their work. They are incredibly hard-working, efficient and good at arranging outward and inward delegations and taking up often complicated causes when we ask them to. Having recently spent three days at the IPU offices in Geneva on a seminar, I saw that the professionalism and the quality of work done there is superb. The preparations for a report were superb, and we should value that.

I agree with my right hon. Friend's scepticism about the value of the IPU's subsuming itself into the United Nations. I am not being anti-United Nations, quite the opposite, but there is an important role for parliamentarians to play, possibly separate from the UN, but working with it. To subsume the IPU within the UN system might mean that it simply gets lost as yet another UN agency and finds it difficult to get the hearing that it currently gets and the relative freedom to take action on behalf of parliamentarians around the world who are in difficulties because of their views.

The IPU was founded in the period of the 19th century when the idea of holding unaccountable executives to account was fairly new. The idea of a strong Parliament did not really develop anywhere in the world until well into the 19th century, and one must say that those who founded the IPU were visionaries in many ways. It was initially small, because most of the world was made up of colonies of European nations. It started in European nations and has been an important element in promoting democracy and accountable government in Europe. It has been a huge influence in the anti-colonial movement around the world and in a whole lot of things that were spawned from that. We would do well to record our thanks for what the people involved did.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley rightly drew attention to the plight of parliamentarians around the world. An ultra-cynic could say, "Here we go again—British Members of the House of Commons defending other parliamentarians around the world." Yes, we do; not because we think that parliamentarians are exclusively good or special people but because if we cannot defend those who have been elected to represent others and to defend a point of view and other people, how can we defend anybody? That is why it is important that we make an enormous fuss about parliamentarians anywhere in the world, whether or not we agree with them. They have been elected and should be defended.

My right hon. Friend was right to mention the large number of Palestinian parliamentarians in prison in Israeli jails. How can we say to the people of Palestine, "We think you should have an elected democracy"? I was there as an NGO election observer for the presidential election, and there was nothing wrong with the electoral process. There was an awful lot wrong with the roadblocks, the checks and all the harassment that went on, but nothing wrong with the electoral process itself. A president was elected, and a few months later a Parliament was elected. If the message is, "You have elected a Parliament, we don't like the result and we're going to imprison those who were victorious", that is hardly a good advertisement for democracy there or anywhere else in the world. I endorse the call that has been made for the release of Marwan Barghouti and the others, who will be part of a dialogue that will eventually bring about peace and justice for the Palestinian people. That in turn will bring about security for ordinary people in Israel—the two things are indivisible.

My right hon. Friend also mentioned Turkey. For a long time, she and I have taken up the case of the Kurdish parliamentarians who were imprisoned. I was in Turkey last month, and during my visit I saw problems such as the lack of recognition of Kurdish parties and the 10 per cent. voting threshold that Turkey imposes before a party can be represented nationally. There are serious problems with that, but a large number of independent parliamentarians essentially represent the interests of Kurdish people in the south and east of Turkey. My position is not to endorse or support any violent activity by the PKK or anybody else, but if political representation, cultural identity and the right to speak one's own language are locked off, there ain't much left as an alternative. That is what has fuelled so much anger and violence in southern and eastern Turkey for a long time. We must bear that in mind.

We were successful in the campaign for the release of the former Deputy Prime Minister of Malaysia, who suffered the most appalling abuse and had the most appalling nonsense spoken about him. The campaign brought about his release.

Next Wednesday I have secured an Adjournment debate—sadly only half an hour, but that's the way it goes—on Bangladesh. There are serious concerns that the interim Government there have continually increased their own longevity. Elections have not been held, and they now say that they need a year to prepare for elections. I realise that the tragedy of the cyclone and the floods must take priority over absolutely everything in the immediate future; I am not saying anything different. But, as a Commonwealth country, a member of the IPU and a democratic country—its constitution is democratic—Bangladesh should hold elections and the democratic process should take over. The democratic process is not enhanced by suspending political activity, banning political parties or imprisoning political leaders. If that happens, people resort to other means of doing things.

The hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) mentioned the situation in Colombia, which I once visited on a trade union delegation. I will never forget meeting Colombian members of congress and Senator Wilson Borja. Visiting his house was like going to an Army camp in South Armagh 20 years ago. It had barbed wire, watch towers and cameras, and that was for a radical, centre-left politician who has been shot at a number of times, very seriously injured on many occasions and survived. His idea of political activity is extremely limited because he cannot travel around and there are frequent threats to his life. There are also threats to many others—he is just one example. Many trade unionists have been killed in Colombia in the recent past. A democracy is not just about having a president and elections but about having the freedom to express oneself politically and engage in political debate. That is not necessarily available for all the people all the time in Colombia.

We are about developing accessible and accountable government. Most hon. Members have mentioned—certainly my hon. Friend the Member for City of Chester (Christine Russell) did—post-conflict societies, how they have to emerge into a democratic model, and what support, recognition and help one can give them in doing that. She talked about Guatemala; sadly, the human rights abuses there, particularly of children and indigenous women, are far from over. While the rates of murder and disappearances are not as high as during the civil war, they are not far off in the poorest communities.

I was invited to lead an IPU delegation to Burundi in September, and it was a very interesting experience. I will not go into all the details because I gave a fairly full report yesterday at the report-back meeting. Burundi struck me as being rather like Rwanda and neighbouring states that have gone through the most incredible conflict, the like of which we can hardly understand. Some 300,000 people have lost their lives in the conflict in the past decade or so. Depending on whom one believes, that amounts to between 5 and 10 per cent. of the population. The median age of the population is 16. There are desperate attempts to develop free primary education, which I absolutely endorse, and free health care for under-fives and nursing mothers, which I also absolutely endorse. It is a very brave attempt by Burundi to achieve its millennium goals. Again, I thank the Department for International Development and others for giving the necessary support to go some way towards achieving those goals.

During that delegation, we spent a lot of time meeting representatives of the Senate and the National Assembly. We kept on emphasising the importance of having a parliamentary system that held the Government or the Executive to account. There is nothing wrong with a Parliament disagreeing with an Executive, and there is nothing wrong with MPs asking Governments and Executives awkward questions. That is why we exist. I emphasised that I have exercised that position fully here over many years, as have many others. That is what we are here for; we are not a rubber stamp or a technical process. We are part of the whole process.

The delegation met for a long period and had a very good meeting with the Burundi human rights group. We talked at length about its need for support, facilities and operations, because when a country comes out of that kind of conflict, human rights abuses continue and there is continual instability. There is also a large number of people with not much to do, who have knowledge of and access to weaponry and guns. If the whole thing goes wrong, the country could easily implode back into civil war. We have a responsibility to support the development process, and I see the development of accountable government as a part of that.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that post-conflict states are very vulnerable in the five years after a conflict and are likely to go back to the previous conflict unless they can get the sort of institutional change that he is talking about? It is all very well to have a Parliament that can hold a Government to account, but one thing that DFID is working very hard on is to establish capacity within Governments in such weakened states. Typical examples are Iraq and Afghanistan. The capacity of the Government to deliver any public service is, in both cases, and in a lot of African states, very low. That is what DFID is very good at doing, and we need to concentrate on that aspect.

Jeremy Corbyn: I do not disagree with any of that. Unless the Government of Burundi can develop and deliver the education, health and other services that are vital to the future of the country, all the institutions in the world will not be any good because people will say, "We have elected parliamentarians and politicians and we are still hungry, homeless and illiterate. We still cannot get a doctor or go to a hospital and we are still reliant on tiny remittances from abroad." I once asked somebody in the Congo how the economy of Kinshasa worked. They said, "You buy something in small quantities and sell it in smaller quantities to someone who sells it in even smaller quantities", and so it cascades down the line. There is no real economy there and that is the danger. That is why we have to give support now to countries such as Burundi that are coming out of conflict, otherwise they will descend back into conflict. There is never a shortage of guns in poor countries, but there is always a shortage of food, books and doctors, and we have to do what we can.

The hon. Member for Ribble Valley pointed out that we had one or two nice moments during our visit. My local football team, Arsenal—everyone will have heard of Arsenal—very kindly donated a box of footballs for us to give to a school. We gave them to children who were orphans of the war or AIDS. Football is a universal language and, for the first time, we had real conversations with real people about matters of real importance. Sadly, it turned out that some of the children had, in a very misguided way, been supporting Manchester United. I was forced to stay behind and help them. However, it was a very nice occasion and I want to put on record my thanks to Arsenal for that gesture. It was a very nice gesture and I imagine that it is something we could repeat on other IPU visits. It certainly beat all the other gifts we gave out, and was very popular.

I want to mention another point very quickly because I know that the Minister wants plenty of time to reply. Last month, in Geneva, I attended the IPU-International Labour Organisation-UN Commission on Human Rights seminars on migrant workers around the world, which lasted three days. There was a delegation from Britain and three other European countries, and that was it. There was a large delegation of African countries, and a good representation from Latin American and Asian countries. What is wrong with European Governments and parliamentarians that they find it so difficult to get to Geneva for three days in September? I know that it is a long journey from Paris to Geneva, and a horrendous journey from Berlin, but people made it from southern and central Africa to discuss the plight of the fourth world—the undocumented migrant workers and people who are dying in the ocean trying to get to the Canary Islands, to cross the Mediterranean to get into Spain or Italy, because they are desperately poor and they want to make something of their lives. They then lead a twilight existence in western countries, like the Mexicans in America and so on; there are plenty of parallels around the world. We have a responsibility to try to do something about it.

I was very pleased to be able to go on that delegation, and I was elected the rapporteur of the conference. We put forward a number of ideas, which will be fed through to the migrants conference next year and the IPU assembly. I am grateful to the IPU for sending me there. There are lots of other issues relating to human rights abuses that I would like to mention, but I will conclude with this thought. We all campaigned for an end to the apartheid regime in South Africa because it was morally wrong and evil. That was very unpopular in the 1960s, moderately unpopular in the 1970s and fairly popular by the 1980s, but it was never easy. It is very difficult sometimes to raise human rights issues, particularly if it is believed or perceived that we have a close economic interest in the country in question. That is why, yes, of course we should raise human rights violations in Burma, but we should do the same if China, India or Saudi Arabia are involved. I have tabled an early-day motion along the line of the points made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley when she introduced the debate.

We have a great institution in the IPU, which is about bringing accountable elected government to the world, as far as possible. I hope and believe and wish that the United States will rejoin the IPU. I have friends in the US Congress—yes, I do, in the anti-war group within Congress. I have said to them, "Join the IPU. It is another forum in which to make better contacts with the rest of the world." That would make the IPU a much stronger organisation.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): With the leave of the House, I call the Minister, who I am sure will be able to wind up the debate.

5.10 pm

Mr. Jim Murphy: Thank you, Sir Nicholas. With the leave of the House, I would like the opportunity to do just that. I hope that no one takes this the wrong way, particularly you, Sir Nicholas. Occasionally in the course of a parliamentary day but often in the course of a parliamentary week, one hears an interesting speech. What has been fascinating today—I hope that you will agree, Sir Nicholas—is that we have heard seven interesting speeches. I have learned something different from each and every one of them. I am not complaining about the amount of time that is available to me, because it was important that everyone had the opportunity to speak about their own experience, but I may not be able to respond to every point. However, I will ensure that the Secretary of State has an opportunity to pay close attention to many of the specific details that were discussed.

I would like to thank you, Sir Nicholas, for presiding over our sitting in the way that you did. I am reliably informed that you are one of the members of the executive who has attended every executive meeting. You have an unblemished attendance record. As a former Whip, I am proud of you.

The hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) made an interesting speech. He, too, is a former Whip. He spoke about his experiences during a visit to Mexico and many other matters to which I shall respond in a moment. He also gave an impromptu democracy audit, and I share his assessment.

We have heard about worrying and continuing problems in different parts of the world. We can even look on our near doorstep at the massive transformation in eastern Europe that has occurred in our own lifetime. Things are not perfect, and there are continuing worries about some countries. For example, there were recent announcements about a lack of election monitoring in Russia. There are still problems there, but the spread of democracy closer to home than some of the areas that have been discussed is a cause for celebration.

The hon. Member for Cheadle (Mark Hunter) made several points to which I will respond. He spoke about the importance of gender equality and other issues for this country: our interface with parliamentarians outside of Europe, and the parity and participation of black and minority ethnic citizens in our own Parliament and the signal that that sends to parliamentarians in the countries with which we seek a dialogue. I believe that it was the hon. Member for Cotswold who quoted Edmund Burke. I do not seek to quote him but to record the fact that he opposed extending the franchise to women. To return to the point made by the hon. Member for Cheadle, perhaps the quote is not one that can be used in all cases.

I understand why the hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) cannot be with us today. Quite rightly, with all cross-party support, he is celebrating the return of the 1st Battalion the Royal Anglian Regiment, which has done a phenomenal job in southern Afghanistan as part of the international effort. We all rightly pay tribute to their work.

I shall deal with some of the specific points and countries that have been mentioned. It was right that everyone paid tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd). I remember throughout the mid-1980s, when the matter was not headline news, trying to organise demonstrations in Scotland about Kurdish rights. Other Members were also involved in that. My right hon. Friend was the leading voice throughout that period.

My right hon. Friend raised specific points about Saudi Arabia and told us about the terrible case of the young lady there. We all share her concern about those horrible events, and we continue to raise with the Saudi authorities our specific and general concerns about human rights. We did so again recently during the two kingdoms conference.

On the wider points about parliamentarians in Eritrea and Palestine—my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) also raised the matter—and the specific points about Marwan Barghouti and others, the fact is that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office has expressed its continuing concerns about Palestinian prisoners who are being held in administrative detention, and we will continue to raise the matter with the Israeli authorities. We are and will continue to be in close contact with the International Committee of the Red Cross, which monitors conditions in Israeli prisons. I shall bring the matter to the attention of the Minister for the Middle East, specifically the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North, my right hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley and my hon. Friend the Member for City of Chester (Christine Russell).

Mr. Clifton-Brown: In order that something positive can come out of this debate, will the Minister make personal representations to his former colleague the right hon. Tony Blair about the Palestinian MPs who have been arrested by the Israelis? It seems to me that if we could get rid of that layer of anxiety, it would be the first step towards peace between those two countries.

Mr. Murphy: I am certain that that would be part of the solution to the remarkably multi-layered and complicated dynamic that is peace in the middle east, which often is about process and staging posts towards what we know is the ultimate solution of two democratic states living side by side with one another, both of which are viable, both of which are friends, and both of which, in time, have normalised relationships of the kind that many adjoining countries around the world take for granted. Of course those are important issues. I am not certain whether I will have an opportunity to raise them with Tony Blair before the meeting in Annapolis next week, but they will be part of the conversation that will take place there.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House made the point that if a Government have confidence to abuse their elected politicians, there is a near certainty that they are dismissive of their own public's rights. That is no more certain than in Zimbabwe, where grotesque violations of human rights and the disruption of the country are clear for all to see. That is why, among other things, the United Kingdom will not participate in the forthcoming EU-Africa summit. It would send the wrong signal and legitimise Mugabe at a time when he is so ill-deserving of that.

We have ensured that if Mugabe were to attend the gathering, there would be high-level representation by all European Union members in a plenary session. I believe that we all agree that we should not allow one individual to overshadow and make a mockery of a fundamentally important and historic gathering of two great groups of nations, which will try to find some solutions to long-term systemic and structural problems, not least getting the millennium development goals back on track.

On the points raised by almost everyone about Burma, it is clear that the IPU's work on that country is of crucial importance. The decision to prioritise the resolution sent a clear and important message. The UK Government—supported on a cross-party basis, it is fair to say—continue to send that message. A Government who can abuse the many hundreds of peaceful, spiritual monks in public view in the way that they did, are a Government who, in private, behind closed doors and away from the TV cameras, are doing much worse to their general population. Perhaps that is the wrong way of looking at the situation, but it is one way of judging it.

The Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary therefore raised Burma with the UN Secretary-General, Ban Ki-moon, and senior leaders and Ministers in Europe, Asia and north America, and will continue to do so. We have discussed the matter at the EU. Indeed, I attended a meeting earlier this week at which it was discussed, and the Foreign Secretary attended a meeting last month at which specific, detailed agreements were put in place. Important sanctions have been put in place, but we do not rule anything out in terms of further European sanctions against Burma.

My hon. Friend the Member for City of Chester referred to the British Council, and an interesting insight into its work is that its offices are one of the few places where the country's citizens can still access the internet. The hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) referred to his experience of queues outside another British Council office, but that is also happening in Burma. There is anecdotal evidence that the children of the regime are also trying to find out what is happening in the world. That is not the British Council's purpose, but it plays a crucial role there, as in many other places.

Earlier this week in Brussels, I had the opportunity with 26 other European Ministers to meet Iraq's Foreign Minister. The UK and, importantly, France have tabled a joint paper with Sweden on human rights and developments in Iraq. The French Minister for Europe publicly and rightly raised the issue of the death penalty in Iraq, and we shall continue to do so.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mrs. Moon) spoke about her recovery from "Groganitis" while making her informed points about Albania. We all know that Albania is recovering from a remarkably dark period in its history, and it is the responsibility of all of us to support it in that. We are doing what we can. Albania's leadership in respect of Kosovo is remarkable, in both support of refugees and its diplomatic posture. Despite the direct impact on Albania, it has argued eloquently that the issue must be resolved through the international process based on President Ahtisaari's proposals. That is important.

I do not know whether this is the feedback that my hon. Friend received, but our embassy in Albania referred to an anecdote arising from the IPU's visit. Albanian parliamentarians valued the fact that they met not the Government, but individual parliamentarians. One Albanian MP said that because a Member of Parliament made the comment that passing legislation and not implementing it brought Parliament into disrepute, it made an impact. I am not sure which Member of Parliament it was—it may have been my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend, although I was not aware of that when I mentioned it—but the comment was one of many that hit home, not least in Albania. I am sure that such comments from IPU colleagues make a lasting impression on other politicians' perception of the UK, and perhaps in some small but important way have an impact on their actions as politicians.

My hon. Friend the Member for City of Chester rightly raised a number of points, as did other hon. Members, about the British Council, the BBC World Service and the Chevening scholarships. Time does not allow me to pay proper tribute to all three, but the British Council does inspirational work throughout the world. I grew up in South Africa during apartheid, and the World Service when I was a child was one of the few sources of objective information about what was happening in the world, as opposed to the version of events that I was invited to believe by the state-controlled South African Broadcasting Corporation. The BBC World Service is about to launch a remarkable Arabic service, which my hon. Friend the Member for City of Chester may be aware of, and which parliamentarians may have an opportunity to visit. The investment and reach of that service will be of phenomenal importance.

Last night, I spoke at a reception for Chevening scholars from a variety of countries, not least Iran, China and Mexico. Our relationship with some of their Governments is good, and with others it is not so strong, but it was clear that even during the short time that those scholars have been in the UK we have managed to develop a bilateral understanding through scholarship on one another's cultures.

My hon. Friend the Member for City of Chester referred to Jordan, with which we have much in common. It is playing a progressive and important role in the middle east peace process, and I am sure that it will continue to do so at Annapolis and beyond in the months to come.

The hon. Member for Cheadle, among others, spoke about the importance of the European Union. I do not want to belittle today's debate by referring to the to-ing and fro-ing on the European treaty issue because that is for another day, but the European Union has a phenomenally important role on almost every issue that we have discussed today. If it makes sense for parliamentarians to come together to share concerns and exercise influence on a wider stage, as it does, it obviously makes as much sense for Governments and nations to come together through the European Union to exert even greater influence, not just in the countries that we have spoken about, but in Pakistan and many other parts of the globe. An important part of the European Union's soft power is that it has been able to persuade Albania, Kosovo, and in time perhaps Serbia and other nations, such as Turkey, to conform to democratic norms and to introduce important changes.

The hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) spoke about the worry, which I occasionally share, that some people, but not those who have spoken today, seem to look at much of the debate about human rights and internationalism through the prism of anti-Americanism. That is unfortunate. It is a legitimate perspective, but it is wrong. The hon. Gentleman balanced that in his comments, and my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North also balanced that by talking about China and the important work on human rights that must be done there.

The importance of the IPU raising climate change and sustainable development is that it is not seen as coming from the UK Treasury or the Government. It is a legitimate cross-party concern of UK parliamentarians.

Time will not allow me to deal with all the points raised by hon. Members. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North spoke about what might be described as the poorest billion citizens on our planet. He referred to international migrant workers, and the Foreign Office would certainly be interested in his work as rapporteur. Other hon. Members referred to Burundi, and the hon. Member for Cotswold was correct when he referred to the importance of development post-conflict, as a way of preventing repetition of that conflict. In Burundi we are investing in a programme aimed at building Government capacity, and supporting health and education.

Unfortunately, I cannot respond to all the points raised today, but I shall finish with a lighted-hearted point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for City of Chester. She said that football is the new international diplomacy, and the British Council has also referred to that, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North, but he should have declared an interest, because his son works for Arsenal, and I met him when I visited Arsenal. My hon. Friend the Member for City of Chester declared an interest because of her previous employment, and I should declare an interest because I gave my hon. Friend's son an award.

Despite the events of last night, we continue to support Croatia's continued aspiration to become a member of the European Union, and as a Scot, I continue to support Italy's membership, although I am not so sure after the Spanish referee's decision at the game last week.

I shall be going from the Chamber straight to Wembley to play with the all-party parliamentary football team in a football match to raise money for charity, and I invite all hon. Members—including you, Sir Nicholas—regardless of footballing prowess and experience, to join me in that adventure.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at half-past Five o'clock.

Written Ministerial Statements

Wednesday 7 November 2007

TREASURY

United Kingdom/Saudi Arabia (Double Taxation Convention)

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Jane Kennedy): A new Double Taxation Convention with Saudi Arabia was signed on 31 October 2007. After signature, the text of the convention was deposited in the Libraries of both Houses and made available on HM Revenue and Customs' website. The text of the convention will be scheduled to a draft Order in Council and laid before the House of Commons in due course.

BUSINESS, ENTERPRISE AND REGULATORY REFORM

Landward (Onshore) Oil and Gas Licensing Round

The Minister for Energy (Malcolm Wicks): I am pleased to inform the House that I am today inviting applications for Petroleum Exploration and Development Licences (PEDL) for unlicensed blocks in parts of England, Scotland and Wales which will form the 13th round of landward petroleum licensing.

Strategic Environmental Assessment (Sea)—Post Adoption Procedures

BERR's draft plan to offer licences for onshore oil and gas exploration and production through a 13th licensing round has been the subject of a Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) initiated in 2005. The SEA is documented on the Department's website at: www.og.berr.gov.uk/consultations/index.htm.

The SEA considered the alternatives to the draft plan and the potential implications of resultant activities in the context of the objective of the draft plan, the SEA objectives, the existing regulatory and other control mechanisms, the existing environmental problems and their likely evolution over time, and in the light of scoping feedback provided by consultation bodies and others. The conclusion of the SEA was to proceed with the licensing programme, but with some licensing conditions. It was recommended that BERR place an explicit expectation on licence applicants to demonstrate understanding of the environmental sensitivities and potential constraints on blocks both at the application stage and during any subsequent operations.

The assessment was documented in an environmental report which was subject to a three-month public consultation. The start of the consultation was widely advertised in newspapers and by email.

All responses received from statutory and other consultees on the draft plan and the environmental report have been considered by BERR and a post consultation report prepared and placed on the Department's website (link above). This report summarises consultee comments and BERR responses to them.

In deciding to proceed with a 13th onshore licensing round, BERR has considered the conclusions and recommendations of the SEA environmental report together with feedback received from consultees.

Under the terms of a PEDL, licensees may not conduct activities such as the drilling of wells, installation of facilities or production of hydrocarbons without the authorisation of the Secretary of State and licensees are required to provide proof to BERR that the relevant planning and other permissions and consent(s) have been obtained.

Once block applications have been received, the Department will undertake a plan level appropriate assessment (AA) screening or full assessment (as appropriate) of the potential for likely resultant activities in the blocks to adversely affect the integrity of Natura 2000 conservation sites. This AA will consider specific blocks and provides BERR with a further opportunity to identify if there are overriding reasons not to offer a licence for a particular block.

In addition to the website above, a copy of the SEA environmental report and post consultation report can be reviewed at:

Companies Act

The Minister for Competitiveness (Mr. Stephen Timms): The Companies Act 2006, which received Royal Assent on 8 November 2006, will bring major benefits to business by modernising and simplifying company law.

The Government set out the commencement timetable for the Act by written statement on 28 February 2007. There were three main phases to the implementation timetable, with most provisions being commenced on 1 October 2007, 6 April 2008 or 1 October 2008.

In line with this timetable, a major tranche of provisions was commenced on 1 October 2007, including provisions relating to directors' general duties, the business review and company resolutions and meetings. A further tranche of provisions will be commenced with effect from 6 April 2008, including the provisions relating to accounts and reports, audit and abolishing the obligation on private companies to have company secretaries.

The written statement of 28 February 2007 explained that we need to ensure that the registrar of companies has sufficient time to implement important changes to Companies House systems and processes in relation to areas such as company formation, and give appropriate notice to users of the new forms. For this reason, the Government decided that the commencement of provisions most closely relating to these changes should be commenced with effect from 1 October 2008.

Companies House has made considerable progress with the necessary changes to its systems and processes. However, there remains a great deal of work to be done and the Registrar of Companies has advised that he cannot be absolutely confident that the necessary changes can be completed on time. The Government recognise that business needs certainty about the implementation timetable, and has therefore decided that the commencement date for most of the provisions due to be commenced on 1 October 2008 should be put back to 1 October 2009. This includes provisions relating to company formation, share capital, company and business names and directors' residential addresses.

There are some provisions due to be commenced on 1 October 2008 which do not necessitate changes to Companies House systems and processes. These could still be commenced on 1 October 2008, but we recognise the need to balance the timing of the commencement of deregulatory provisions against the complexity of phased implementation. The Government therefore intends to consult key stakeholders about the commencement date for the following provisions:

sections 69 to 74: objection to company names; sections 82 to 85: trading disclosures;

sections 155 to 159: provisions relating to corporate directors and under-age directors; sections 175 to 177: general duties of directors in respect of conflicts of interest; sections 182 to 187: declaration by a director of an interest in an existing transaction or arrangement; sections 811 (4), 812 and 814: inspection of register of interests in a company's shares; repeal of the restrictions under the Companies Act 1985 on financial assistance for acquisition of shares in private companies, including the "whitewash" procedure.

I will make a further statement in December setting out the final commencement timetable in the light of these discussions.

CHILDREN, SCHOOLS AND FAMILIES

Free Early Education Entitlement

The Minister for Children, Young People and Families (Beverley Hughes): I am announcing today plans to implement the Government's commitment to extension of the free early education entitlement for three and four-year-olds to 15 hours each week for 38 weeks a year.

A longer entitlement, delivered more flexibly, will give children an even better start in life than the current arrangements and will give parents greater choice in balancing their work and family life. That is why over the next CSR period we are making funding available to enable every local authority to deliver 15 hours free early education a week to all 3 and 4 year olds for 38 weeks of the year, and to ensure the options available for using it are more flexible.

The extension will be phased in over the three years of the CSR period. Twenty pathfinder local authorities have been delivering the extended flexible entitlement since April 2007, assessing the demand for different patterns of provision, and exploring ways of working that enable greater flexibility in a diverse childcare market. Another 14 local authorities have been selected to join this group as a second wave of pathfinders, starting in September 2008. These authorities are: the London boroughs of Hackney, Lambeth and Brent, Wolverhampton, Liverpool, Salford, Kirklees, Middlesbrough, North-East Lincolnshire, Luton, Durham, Southampton, Nottingham City and Cornwall.

All local authorities not involved in the pathfinder phase will be funded to deliver 15 hours more flexible provision to their most disadvantaged children from September 2009. A year later the rollout will be completed, with every three and four-year-old eligible to receive 15 hours free per week, to be delivered as flexibly as possible in response to parental demand from September 2010.

The extension of the free entitlement and more flexible delivery will be funded through a new investment of £80 million/£170 million/£340 million over 2008-11, which will be made available through the standards fund.

This funding is over and above the amount already provided for the free early education entitlement as part of the dedicated schools grant. This large injection of additional funding emphasises the Government's commitment to ensure that every child gets the best possible start in life and to help as many families as possible escape poverty and balance work and family life effectively.

DEFENCE

Service Complaints Commissioner

The Minister for the Armed Forces (Mr. Bob Ainsworth): A number of improvements have been made to the Service redress of individual grievance process (the Service complaints process) under the Armed Forces Act 2006 in light of recommendations made by Nicholas Blake QC. One of these is the establishment of the post of Service Complaints Commissioner, which will introduce an element of independence to the system and provide assurance that the system is working fairly and effectively. I am pleased to announce that Dr Susan Atkins has been appointed to the post of Commissioner. She will have a comprehensive induction prior to taking up full duties when the new Service complaints process comes into effect in January 2008.

As Commissioner, Dr Atkins can receive complaints directly from Service personnel, or allegations made on their behalf by family members or other third parties, about any wrong against a Service person in relation to harassment, bullying or other improper behaviour, and will have the power to refer them to the chain of command for action. She will be notified of the outcome. The Commissioner will also provide an annual report to the Secretary of State for Defence on the fairness, effectiveness and timeliness of the Service complaints process which will be laid before Parliament and published.

The appointment of the Commissioner is an important step towards the full implementation of the new Service complaints process which is due to come into effect in January 2008.

Afghanistan: Operational Command and Control

The Secretary of State for Defence (Des Browne): As part of our ongoing support to current operations, I am today announcing the formation of a temporary brigade headquarters to command UK forces in Afghanistan over the period October 2009 to April 2010. The brigade, which will be known as 11 Light Brigade, will be formed from existing service personnel and will be based in Aldershot.

The current deployment of UK troops in Afghanistan as part of the NATO-led international security assistance force is planned until 2009, although we have always made clear that our commitment to Afghanistan is a long-term one. The precise size and duration of the UK military in Afghanistan will depend on a number of factors, including the ability of Afghan security forces to take greater responsibility for the security of their own country. However, to ensure that any forces we might deploy are properly prepared and commanded, it is necessary for the brigade headquarters to be established now. We will keep our planning assumption under review but currently we assess that this HQ would disband on its return from Afghanistan.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH OFFICE

Visit of Prime Minister Erdogan of Turkey

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Jim Murphy): The Prime Minister of Turkey, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, visited the UK on 22 to 23 October. This visit provided a good opportunity to discuss not only issues relating to Turkey's EU accession negotiations, but also the broad range of shared interests.

During his meeting with Mr. Erdogan on 23 October, the Prime Minister reiterated the UK's strong support for Turkish accession to the European Union, and encouraged the Turkish Government to continue with its programme of reforms, and implementing its obligations to the European Union. In the context of a series of separatist Kurdish PKK attacks on Turkey in recent weeks, the Prime Minister condemned the indefensible terrorist violence, welcomed Turkey's restraint in the face of severe provocation, and urged continued dialogue with international partners to resolve the issue.

The meeting also covered the launch of the Turkey/United Kingdom Strategic Partnership 2007-08. This document draws together into one jointly agreed high-level bilateral document the breadth of co-operation across the two Governments on a wide range of issues.

These include work to further Turkey's EU accession process; improve our co-operation on global security (in particular the fight against terrorism, weapons proliferation, and organised crime); promote regional stability; deepen the defence relationship; tackle climate change and co-operate on developing secure energy supplies; increase our bilateral trade and investment; and increase our ties in education and culture.

In addition, the strategic partnership covered Cyprus settlement issues. It emphasised the primary importance of supporting the UN's efforts to reunify the island. The leaders of the two communities in Cyprus reached agreement on 8 July 2006 on steps designed to lead to a resumption of settlement negotiations. That agreement, which has the full support of the UK, UN Security Council and the international community, has yet to be implemented. During his meeting with Mr. Erdogan, the Prime Minister underlined the importance of all parties seizing the opportunity for progress next year.

The strategic partnership also described a number of measures designed to bring the Turkish Cypriot community closer to Europe in order to prepare for reunification.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Justice and Home Affairs Council

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Meg Hillier): The Justice and Home Affairs Council will be held on 8 and 9 November 2007 in Brussels. My right hon. Friend the Lord Chancellor and Secretary of State for Justice, the Solicitor General of Scotland, Frank Mulholland, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Justice, my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham East (Bridget Prentice), and I will attend on behalf of the UK.

There will be a lunch before the start of the Council on 8 November for Interior Ministers, where the presidency is expected to report on the current work of the future group on home affairs. The Government would like to ascertain Slovenian plans for the group as the incoming presidency. My right hon. and noble Friend Baroness Scotland represents the Common Law Group of countries including the UK on this group.

The Council will start with the Mixed Committee items also attended by Norway, Iceland and Switzerland. Among these will be reports on the state of play regarding biometric visas, common standards on returning illegally staying third country nationals, and the implementation of SISOne4all, SIS II and the SIS Communication Network. The Government remain keen for implementation of the Schengen Information System II to stay on timetable.

The presidency is likely to put the data protection framework decision to a general approach on the articles and certain recitals. The Government support the proposed general approach.

The main agenda will open with a discussion of chapters 2 and 3 of the draft Council decision on Europol. The Government support the proposed conclusion of negotiations of these two chapters, which deal with information processing systems and common provisions on information processing. The text offers a balance of giving Europol added flexibility enabling it to establish new data systems while at the same time providing limits on what can be stored and safeguards for the protection of personal data. The Government also support the proposal for the implementation plan, which has been developed at the request of the June JHA Council to set out the steps and timescales for the introduction of Community Financing for Europol from January 2010.

The presidency is likely to seek a general approach on the Council decision implementing the Prüm arrangements for the exchange of data on fingerprints, DNA and vehicle registration. This instrument sets out the technical details to bring into operation the original Council Decision on Prüm, which was agreed in June. In parallel the presidency has sent the text of the Council decision to the European Parliament for an opinion to be delivered during the European Parliament plenary session on 9 and 10 April 2008.

The proposal on Council decision on the improvement of co-operation between the special intervention units of the member states of the European Union in crisis situations is also likely to go to the Council for a general approach. This decision creates a framework for crisis intervention units from a given member state to provide assistance to other member states. The UK is supportive of this decision as it enables member states to receive assistance from other member states if they so require, although the UK does not envisage needing to use this agreement. The scheme is voluntary and places no obligation on member states to either request or provide assistance. The UK is able to provide assistance to another member state if it wishes to do so under this agreement. If we want to call on assistance from another member state for a foreign crisis intervention unit to exercise police powers here, we would need to make legislative changes to UK law. The European Parliament's opinion is also outstanding on this proposal and is expected after 15 January 2008.

Two new draft directives on legal migration will be presented by the Commission. The first is for a new EU "Blue Card" scheme to attract highly skilled migrants. The second proposes a single application procedure for third country nationals entering the EU, combining separate applications for residency and the right to work into a single application. We will only opt-in to these directives if it is in the UK's national interest to do so and we judge them to be compatible with our points-based system for managed migration.

Although the UK is not participating in the application of the draft regulation amending the common consular instructions, the UK has been involved in the discussions, particularly where they relate to biometric capture and age limits. The presidency noted that a number of key issues, which had been extensively examined at working party level, remained outstanding, and that further discussion with, among others, the European Parliament is necessary.

The presidency will report on progress made in negotiations on the draft directive on common standards and procedures in member states for returning illegally staying third-country nationals. The Government made the decision not to opt in to this Directive shortly after it was issued in September 2005. The Scrutiny Committees of both Houses agreed with that decision. Negotiations in the Council have been lengthy and the first reading has not yet been completed. There are a number of outstanding issues unresolved. The content of the draft directive has not changed sufficiently for the Government to reassess the original decision not to opt-in.

The presidency will report back on the Balkans Ministerial Forum on Justice and Home Affairs that took place in Brdo in October. They will also announce the EU-LAC (Latin America and Caribbean) seminar on migration.

The presidency also wants to obtain agreement on the proposed directive on certain aspects of mediation in civil and commercial matters. The Government support this proposal. It believes this type of citizen focused practical measure demonstrates the value of European co-operation in this field. By promoting the use of mediation to settle cross-border disputes this instrument will be of benefit to Europe's citizens and businesses.

A debate is also scheduled on certain aspects of the proposed Council framework decision on the recognition and supervision of suspended sentences, alternative sanctions and conditional sentences.

The presidency has stressed the importance of implementing the Council of Europe Convention and it is hoped that the Council conclusions on Cybercrime will be agreed at this Council. The Government agree on the need for co-operation with non-EU states, and fully support the Council of Europe Convention.

It is also hoped that Council conclusions on trafficking in human beings will be adopted. The Government welcome renewed activity in the European Commission on human trafficking.

The Council will conclude with a lunch for Justice Ministers to discuss the outcome of the European Court of Justice's decision in the "Ship Source Pollution" case. The Government welcome the clarification which this judgment has provided.

LEADER OF THE HOUSE

Deposited Papers

The Leader of the House of Commons (Ms Harriet Harman): I am pleased to announce that from today all documents deposited in the Library of the House by Ministers will be done so electronically. Members and Peers will still be able to request a hard copy document from the Library as well as an electronic version which, whenever possible, will be available online at http://deposits.parliament.uk/ in a single series containing both House of Commons and House of Lords Library deposited papers.

The Library document "Rules for depositing papers in the Libraries of the House of Commons and Lords" is available on the Parliament website.

I am grateful to Government Departments for their co-operation and the Libraries of both Houses for their work in improving access to information for Members of Parliament and the public.

JUSTICE

Boundary Commission for England

The Secretary of State for Justice and Lord Chancellor (Mr. Jack Straw): I should like to inform the House that I have, under schedule 1 to the Parliamentary Constituencies Act 1986, reappointed Mr Michael Lewer CBE, QC as a member of the Boundary for Commission for England. The appointment is effective from 1 November 2007 to 31 October 2008.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Independent Monitoring Commission

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Shaun Woodward): I have received the 17th Report of the Independent Monitoring Commission (IMC). This report has been made under articles 4 and 7 of the International Agreement that established the Commission and it reports on levels of paramilitary activity in Northern Ireland. I have considered the content of the report and I am today bringing it before Parliament. I have placed copies in the Library of the House.

The report confirms the IMC's previous assessments that the ERA is fully committed to pursuing the political path and that it will not be diverted from it. Paragraph 2.2 of the report notes that "Sinn Fein's entry into the Northern Ireland Executive has meant that the provisional movement as a whole has been more closely engaged in the democratic process" and that, against this background, the IMC "strongly believe that this position is now stable".

On Loyalism, I welcome the IMC's assessment that the UVF's 3 May 2007 statement, renouncing violence and committing to transform itself from a military to a civilian organisation, represents 'a major turning point' for the organisation. The report notes that the position is not yet entirely transformed and there are some pockets of resistance but does not doubt that the leadership is clear on the direction in which it is taking the organisation, has briefed the message in the statement down to the grass roots and has started to take steps to reduce the organisation's size.

I share, however, the concern of the IMC that the pace of real change within the UDA remains far too slow. The IMC recognise that internal turbulence within the UDA has been a key factor in this in the six months under review, giving rise to continuing incidents of violence. The report also notes the very recent progress there has been by way of contact between the UDA and the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning. But the violent scenes in Carrickfergus and Bangor were a stark reminder of Northern Ireland's troubled past. We must see an end to violence and criminality of this kind.

The IMC also calls on both the UVF and the UDA to decommission as a test by which any paramilitary organisation must ultimately expect to be judged. The report notes that in respect of PIRA the IMC did not consider it had embarked on a political path until after it had decommissioned arms in September 2005 and that it takes no different approach to the UVF or UDA.

In relation to dissident republican groups, the IMC makes it clear that these groups still pose a threat. Three paramilitary murders were reported, the first since February 2006. All three have been attributed to dissidents. These groups are ruthless and dangerous, and their intent to cause harm and destruction is undiminished, but they will not deter us from achieving long-term political stability.

Once again, I am grateful to the IMC for their submission of this report and for its careful analysis. As ever, this report offers a clear picture of the challenges ahead to secure an end to paramilitarism in Northern Ireland.

Government's Legislative Programme (Application to Northern Ireland)

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Shaun Woodward): The Third Session UK legislative programme unveiled in the Queen's Speech on the 6 November contains measures of relevance to the people of Northern Ireland.

The following is a summary of the legislation announced in the Queen's Speech and its impact in Northern Ireland. This does not include draft Bills. The Bills listed in section 1 are not likely to contain provisions requiring the consent of the Northern Ireland Assembly because the legislation is predominantly or wholly within an excepted area. Section 2 details Bills that are likely to contain provisions that require the consent of the Northern Ireland Assembly. Finally, section 3 details Bills that will have a limited impact in Northern Ireland because, for example, they extend only to England and Wales.

The list also identifies the lead Government Department.

1. The following Bills extend to Northern Ireland, in whole or in part, and deal mainly with excepted or reserved matters:

Banking (HM Treasury)

Counter Terrorism (Home Office)

Criminal Justice and Immigration (Ministry of Justice)

European Communities (Finance) (HM Treasury)

Human Fertilisation and Embryos (Department of Health)

National Insurance Contribution (HM Treasury)

Regulatory Enforcement and Sanctions (Department for Business, Enterprise & Regulatory Reform)

2. It is intended that the following Bills will extend to Northern Ireland to varying degrees. They will require the consent of the Northern Ireland Assembly in relation to those provisions in the devolved field:

Child Maintenance and Other Payments (Department of Work and Pensions)

Climate Change (Department of Environment, Food and Rural Affairs)

Dormant Bank and Building Society Accounts (HM Treasury)

Education and Skills (Department for Children, Schools and Families)

Energy (Department for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform)

Health and Social Care (Department of Health)

Pensions (Department of Work and Pensions)

Planning Reform (Department for Communities and Local Government)

Discussions will continue between the Government and the Northern Ireland Executive on Bills that might include provisions that require the consent of the Northern Ireland Assembly.

3. The following Bills will have limited or no impact in Northern Ireland:

Channel Tunnel Rail Link (Department for Transport)

Coroners (Ministry of Justice)

Crossrail (Department for Transport)

Employment (Department for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform)

Housing and Regeneration (Department for Communities and Local Government)

Local Transport (Department for Transport)

Sale of Student Loans (HM Treasury).

SCOTLAND

Queen's Speech

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Des Browne): The Third Session UK legislative programme unveiled in the Queen's Speech on 6 November contains significant measures of relevance and benefit to the people of Scotland.

The Government are committed to continuing to deliver improvements to the lives of people across Scotland and the rest of the United Kingdom.

The following is a summary of the legislation announced in the Queen's Speech and its impact in Scotland. This does not include draft Bills. The Bills listed in section 1 are not likely to contain provisions requiring the consent of the Scottish Parliament as the legislation is predominantly or wholly within a reserved area. Section 2 details Bills that are likely to contain provisions that require the consent of the Scottish Parliament in line with the Sewel Convention. A brief description is provided of the provisions likely to require consent. Section 3 details Bills that predominantly apply to England and Wales only whilst also containing some significant reserved provisions which will have an impact in Scotland. The Bills listed in section 4 predominantly apply to England and Wales only and will have limited impact in Scotland.

The list also identifies the lead Government Department:

1. UK legislation a wholly or predominantly reserved area, unlikely to contain provisions requiring the consent of the Scottish Parliament at Introduction:

The Bills in this section which deal with predominantly or wholly reserved matters are detailed below. Discussions will continue between the Government and the Scottish Executive to ensure that if provisions relating to matters which trigger the Sewel Convention are included, the consent of the Scottish Parliament will be sought for them:

Banking (HMT)

Channel Tunnel Rail Link (Supplementary Provisions) (Department for Transport)

Child Maintenance and Other Payments (Department for Work and Pensions)

Counter-Terrorism (Home Office)

Crossrail (Department for Transport)

Employment (Department for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform)

Energy (Department for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform)

European Communities (Finance) (HMT)

European Union Reform Treaty (Foreign and Commonwealth Office)

Human Fertilisation and Embryology (Department of Health)

National Insurance Contributions (HMT)

Political Party Funding and Expenditure (MOJ)

Pensions (Department for Work and Pensions)

2. Legislation likely to contain provisions requiring the consent of the Scottish Parliament at Introduction:

Discussions will continue between the Government and the Scottish Executive on Bills that might include provisions that trigger the Sewel Convention. The Bills identified within the Queen's Speech in this section are as follows:

Climate Change (Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs) Legislation relating to Climate Change is likely to include provisions in devolved areas to meet the new emissions target. The environment is a devolved matter in Scotland.

Dormant Bank and Building Society Accounts (HMT) Scottish Ministers will be provided with a power in this Bill to distribute funds drawn from dormant bank accounts - Welsh and Northern Irish Ministers will also have similar powers. This will enable Scottish Ministers to direct spending priorities for their share of these assets in Scotland.

Education and Skills (Department for Child, Schools and Families) Education is a devolved matter but the Bill is likely to include provisions relating to data sharing that extend to Scotland to allow access to longitudinal surveys. This will enable assessments to be made on wage impact of education and training provisions.

Health and Social Care Bill (Department of Health) Health is a predominantly devolved matter, but the Bill will contain provisions relating to the regulation of health care professions; where the regulation of particular professions is devolved, the consent of the Scottish Parliament is required in order to produce a consistent and fair system across the UK for healthcare professionals.

3. Legislation that predominantly applies to England and Wales only whilst also containing some significant reserved provisions which will have an impact in Scotland.

Criminal Justice and Immigration (Ministry of Justice)

Local Transport (Department for Transport)

Planning Reform (Department for Communities and Local Government)

Regulatory Enforcement and Sanctions (Department for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform)

4. Legislation that predominantly applies to England and Wales only or which will have a limited impact in Scotland

Children and Young Persons (Department for Child, Schools and Families)

Housing and Regeneration (Department for Communities and Local Government)

Sale of Student Loans (HMT)

WALES

Government's Legislative Programme (Application to Wales)

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): I am pleased to inform the House that the Queen's Speech on Tuesday 6 November unveiled the Government's Third Session legislative programme which contains 11 bills with Welsh Provisions.

There will be three Bills with framework provisions for Wales:

Education and Skills Bill
Local Transport Bill
Planning Bill

Further information on these provisions will be made available as the provision is introduced.

There are currently a further eight Bills in the programme which may contain specific provisions for Wales, which will generally be provisions to confer the same powers on Welsh Ministers, in devolved areas of responsibility, as are being conferred on UK Ministers in those areas in relation to England. These are:

Health and Social Care Bill
Sale of Student Loans Bill
Children and Young People Bill
Regulatory Enforcement and Sanctions Bill Climate Change Bill
Energy Bill
Housing and Regeneration Bill
Dormant Bank and Building Society Accounts Bill

The Government are committed to delivering devolution and this Session, the first since the Government of Wales Act 2006 has come into effect, will see a record number of proposals for legislative competence to be transferred from Westminster to the National Assembly for Wales, both through framework powers, and by using the new Order in Council process. This marks a coming of age of devolution in Wales, with the Assembly being given the law-making power it needs to properly implement its own policies for the benefit of the people of Wales.

TREASURY

UK Unclaimed Assets Scheme

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Kitty Ussher): The summary of responses to the consultations on a UK Unclaimed Assets Scheme has been published today. Copies are available in the Vote Office, Printed Paper Office and have also been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

This publication also sets out the Government's response to the two consultation proposals for a UK unclaimed assets scheme. The consultation had two stages. In March, the Government released "A UK Unclaimed Assets Scheme: A Consultation". In May, the Government released "Unclaimed Assets Distribution Mechanism: A Consultation".

Following on from these consultations, the Dormant Bank and Building Society Accounts Bill was introduced in the House of Lords on 7 November. A final impact assessment has also been published today, copies of which are also available in the Libraries of both Houses.

The Dormant Bank and Building Society Accounts Bill builds on the Government's consultation and enables the transfer of money in dormant bank accounts to be made available for distribution in the community, while protecting consumers' right to repayment.

Double Taxation Convention (United Kingdom and New Zealand)

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Jane Kennedy): A Protocol to the Double Taxation Convention with New Zealand was signed on 7 November 2007. After signature, the text of the protocol was deposited in the Libraries of both Houses and made available on HM Revenue and Customs' website. The text of the protocol will be scheduled to a draft Order in Council and laid before the House of Commons in due course.

DEFENCE

Service Personnel

The Secretary of State for Defence (Des Browne): We are asking a lot of our service personnel, who are performing magnificently on operations across the world, notably in Iraq and Afghanistan. In turn, it is only right that we support them as best as we can.

As a result of the recent high tempo of operations we have quite rightly seen a greater focus on the support that we offer to our people and their families—both in theatre and at home.

Over the last year we have made significant improvements to the welfare package and to the support that we provide. These include: a rebate on council tax and a tax-free operational allowance for those on operations; an increase in financial support provided for coroners dealing with inquests along with additional support for bereaved families; extension of the mental health assessments and provisions for both veterans and those serving on operations; a commitment to spending £5 billion over the next decade on accommodation; and a significant pay rise for junior soldiers, sailors and airmen and women.

There have been significant improvements to in-theatre medical treatment and facilities and it is widely recognised that we provide first class clinical treatment for those injured through both the NHS and the defence medical services. Better treatment and better equipment mean that our personnel are surviving injuries that they would not have previously survived. As a result we have a number of casualties and personnel sustaining serious injuries who will need enduring support. As a Government we are committed to making sure that the care pathway from initial injury to rehabilitation is as good as it can be.

We also acknowledge that some of the accommodation for service personnel and their families is not up to scratch and we are now rectifying decades of under investment. But we have also said that we want to ensure our forces have the opportunity to get on the housing ladder if they wish and we are looking for the best mechanism to achieve this.

We believe that now is the right time to take stock and for the Government to set out its agenda for service personnel, their families and veterans. Our intention, therefore, is to publish a Command Paper setting out our existing support and in the context of the challenges facing our service personnel today and in the future, the Government's vision for further support. We believe that we are doing a lot to enhance the support we offer our forces in areas like accommodation, education, health care, family support, transition to civilian life, caring for our casualties. However we can do more in all of these areas and we are committed to doing so.

We envisage engagement with key external stakeholders from the charity sector and our service families' federations.

Also, we will conduct a parallel study into encouraging greater engagement, understanding and pride in the UK armed forces by the nation as whole.

We expect that both these studies will be published in spring 2008.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Coexistence of GM and Non-GM Crops

The Minister for the Environment (Mr. Phil Woolas): In 2006 DEFRA consulted stakeholders on proposals for managing the coexistence of GM and non-GM crops in England, should approved GM varieties be grown here commercially in the future. The proposals were consistent with the Government's overall policy on GM crops, as set out in the parliamentary statement made by the then Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Margaret Beckett), on 9 March 2004, Official Report, column 1379.

A factual summary of the consultation responses has been published on the DEFRA's website at: http://www.defra.gov.uk/environment/gm/crops/index.htm. We are grateful to everyone who responded and have considered the various comments made very carefully. It is clear that before our coexistence plans can be finalised we should await various developments that could have an important bearing on how we move forward. These include the following:

Receipt of New Scientific Evidence

The DEFRA consultation paper noted that new research evidence was expected to come forward for consideration in due course, in relation to crop separation distances in particular. There are three important research projects on coexistence that are due to report by next spring (1 DEFRA-funded and 2 EU-funded). After reflecting on the consultation responses, we are also commissioning some further research to improve the evidence-base in certain areas.

Seed Thresholds

The EU is expected to adopt specific thresholds for labelling adventitious GM presence in conventional seeds. These will dictate what level of GM material might be in the seeds sown by non-GM farmers. This in turn bears directly on what coexistence measures need to achieve, in terms of minimising the potential for further GM transfer into non-GM crops. We should await clarification of what seed thresholds are to be adopted.

No commercial GM cultivation is expected in England for several years, but it remains our intention to have appropriate coexistence measures in place beforehand. We will clarify in due course how we intend to proceed in the light of the expected developments noted above, and having considered the consultation responses from stakeholders.

Agriculture and Fisheries Council

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Hilary Benn): I represented the United Kingdom for the agricultural items at this month's Agriculture and Fisheries Council in Luxembourg. The Minister with responsibility for marine, landscape and rural affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Chatham and Aylesford (Jonathan Shaw), represented the UK for fisheries items. The Scottish Cabinet Secretary for Rural Affairs and the Environment, Richard Lochhead, also attended.

The Council adopted a decision authorising Romania to grant national aid to its farmers to assist with the aftermath of recent drought conditions.

The Council reached political agreement on a proposal amending the common agricultural policy financing rules by making it compulsory for member states to publish data on CAP payment beneficiaries; extending Commission powers to suspend or reduce payments under certain conditions; and providing the Commission with an additional 12 months to carry out certain controls on CAP expenditure.

The Council also reached agreement on fishing quotas for the Baltic sea for 2008, despite troubled experiences in Baltic sea fisheries this year.

The Health and Consumer Protection Commissioner presented the Commission communication on the new EU Animal Health Strategy for 2007-13.

The Council held a discussion, based on a presidency questionnaire, on the Commission's proposal on the reform of the EU wine sector. The discussion covered: the proposed national envelopes; the possible use of national envelope money to fund decoupled payments under the single payment scheme; and the scope of the proposed grubbing-up scheme. I intervened to support the principle of national envelopes, but argued that a greater proportion of funding should be used for rural development measures to help producers adapt to the reform. I also intervened to support the use of national envelope money to enhance payments under the SPS and the proposed voluntary grubbing-up scheme that will provide a dignified way out for those farmers most affected by the greater market orientation of the wine sector following the reform.

The Council held an exchange of views on the EU/Norway fisheries agreement for 2008. The UK sought to set responsible levels of fishing while also maintaining the economic viability of the EU fleets involved.

A number of issues, as follows, were raised under any other business:

Spain expressed concerns at the closure of the bluefin tuna fishery as a consequence of overfishing of national allocations by some member states.

Poland called for the introduction of relief measures to alleviate difficulties in the pigmeat sector. The Agriculture Commissioner reported that the Pigmeat Management Committee on 18 October had indeed adopted a proposal to introduce private storage aid from 29 October; as regards export refunds, the Commission did not think that these would be appropriate to address the difficulties faced in the pigmeat sector, although the situation would be kept under review.

Sweden, supported by five other member states, drew Council's attention to recent evidence showing maltreatment of animals during transport and called for full compliance with existing rules.

UN Convention on Climate Change Pre-COP Meeting

The Minister for the Environment (Mr. Phil Woolas): Between 23 and 25 October, I attended the pre-COP ministerial conference of the parties meeting in Bogor, Indonesia. The traditional purpose of the pre-COP ministerial is to narrow down the range of options likely to be discussed at the Conference of the Parties (COP), later in the year.

The UN climate negotiations beginning in Bali this December will be crucial if we are to secure a comprehensive international framework by 2009. The Bali meeting must see the launch of broad and comprehensive negotiations that include all parties and all relevant issues. The pre-COP meeting was a valuable opportunity for Ministers who will be negotiating in December to begin to map out and explore the difficult issues and to start building consensus for some of the essential elements.

The meeting was successful. The EU has done a lot of preparatory work on options for the structure of post-Bali negotiations. The meeting helped to test these propositions against the emerging views of other key players and identified where common ground and potential trade-offs exist with other items on the agenda for Bali. It highlighted many points of consensus between 40 parties present on some key issues, such as: the need for a Bali roadmap towards a fair and balanced multilateral framework beyond 2012, and the need for a process under the convention to further explore and negotiate contributions from developing countries to this framework alongside the continuation of negotiations on further commitments for developed country parties under the Kyoto protocol.

These provide a promising foundation for the discussions in Bali, but perhaps even more valuable was the opportunity to get into the detail on the type of process that needs to be put in place at the COP and on substance. Building trust and developing a full understanding of the positions and concerns of other parties on matters of substance is essential if we are to secure an ambitious outcome in Bali.

There is now considerable support for launching broader negotiations but there is also a range of views about what those broader negotiations could look like. Some parties are committed to securing one process encompassing all the current tracks in the negotiations on future action, while others want to see the convention and Kyoto tracks remain separate, at least for now. Likewise, there was emerging agreement on key elements of an international framework; mitigation, adaptation, technology and investment and finance, although the full details of these four elements and what they might encompass are not universally agreed. Further negotiations will also be needed in order to secure an overall end date of 2009.

It is now essential that we follow up this positive meeting with intensive outreach to our key partners and interlocutors in order to iron out these crucial details and the UK will be carrying out an extensive lobbying effort, both at ministerial and official level, to give the last vital push before Bali.

Public Sector Food Procurement Initiative

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Jonathan Shaw): My right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs promised the House of Commons on 8 March 2007, Official Report, column 1651 in answer to a parliamentary question to commission:

"work to determine the proportion of publicly procured food which is British" and place the information in the Library of the House

"by late autumn 2007 or sooner".

I have today deposited copies of the report giving the proportion of UK produce supplied to Government Departments and also supplied to prisons and hospitals under contracts negotiated by HM Prison Service and NHS Supply Chain. A copy of the report is also on the PSFPI website at:

http://www.defra.gov.uk/farm/policy/sustain/procurement/index.htm.

DEFRA has also published on the PSFPI website the report of an Ipsos MORI survey conducted in the schools sector during the period March to July 2007 that covered 81 local authorities and 255 schools. Commissioned to gauge awareness of the Public Sector Food Procurement Initiative (PSFPI) in schools and local authorities, the report also contains answers to questions on the proportion of tenders from small and local producers. This information was made known to MPs in a written parliamentary answer of 17 October 2007, Official Report, column 1074W.

Govenment Decontamination Service (Business Plan)

The Minister for the Environment (Mr. Phil Woolas): I have set the Government Decontamination Service (GDS) the following performance targets for 2007-08.

To provide operational and tactical advice and guidance to central Government and other appropriate authorities.

To strengthen awareness of its services among key stakeholders.

To continue to provide an evaluated framework of specialist suppliers to meet the requirements arising from the UK national risk assessment process.

To utilise exercises to assess the capacity and capability of specialist framework suppliers.

To contribute to the central Government knowledge on the national capability and capacity for the decontamination of buildings, infrastructure, mobile transport assets and the open environment.

To develop its staff with both the capacity and capability to support the requirements arising from the national risk assessment process.

To build upon corporate governance in line with the revised Treasury Audit Committee Handbook and the National Audit Office and Internal Audit recommendations.

Further details are given in the CDS business plan for 2007-08 copies of which are available in the Libraries of both Houses.

HEALTH

NHS Foundation Trusts

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): The chairman of Monitor (the statutory name of which is the Independent Regulator of NHS foundation trusts) announced last week that, in accordance with section 35 of the National Health Service Act 2006, Monitor had decided to authorise the following NHS acute and mental health trusts as NHS foundation trusts from 1 November;

Poole Hospital NHS Trust; and East London and the City University Mental Health NHS Trust.

Monitor's announcement brings the total number of NHS foundation trusts to 79. A copy of Monitor's press notice has been placed in the Library.

The Government remain committed to offering all NHS acute and mental health trusts the opportunity to apply for foundation status as soon as practicable. Monitor is now authorising trusts on a monthly basis, and further waves of NHS foundation trusts are set to follow.

HOME DEPARTMENT

National Identity Scheme (Cost Report)

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Meg Hillier): The third Cost Report of the National Identity Scheme is being laid before Parliament today. It sets out an estimate of the public expenditure likely to be incurred on the Scheme over the next 10 years, in accordance with section 37 of the Identity Cards Act 2006. It reports on developments over the past six months, since the second Cost Report was published on 10 May 2007.

Complaints Audit Committee (Annual Report 2006-07)

The Minister for Borders and Immigration (Mr. Liam Byrne): I am pleased to announce the publication of the independent Complaints Audit Committee (CAC) annual report for the year 2006-07, and the Border and Immigration Agency's response. Copies of both reports are available in the House and on the Border and Immigration Agency's website.

This is the CAC's thirteenth report. Their role is to monitor the effectiveness of the Agency's procedures for handling complaints.

We welcome the report and its findings which reflect much of the analysis set out by the former Home Secretary, my right hon. Friend the Member for Airdrie and Shotts (John Reid), in the summer of 2006. As part of the reforms instigated by BIA since July 2006 a new complaints procedure has been designed from scratch which the Complaints Audit Committee has been instrumental in shaping and which will go live in February 2008.

TRANSPORT

Local Transport Bill

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Ms Rosie Winterton): I am today publishing the Government's response to the consultation on the draft Local Transport Bill (which was introduced in the House of Lords yesterday and published today). This response explains how the Bill has been revised in the light of pre-legislative scrutiny and responses to the public consultation. I am also publishing a summary of the views expressed in the written responses, at consultation events and meetings, and during the course of a series of regional visits to hear people's views about the draft Bill.

The core purpose of the Bill is to improve public transport and tackle congestion, and it forms a key part of the Government's strategy to empower local authorities to deliver local transport that meets the needs of their communities. In so doing, it will also support the Government's efforts to tackle climate change.

It creates new opportunities for local authorities to deliver bus services that are better suited to the needs of local passengers; to develop more coherent approaches to the planning and delivery of local transport; and, where they wish to do so, to develop local road pricing schemes in a way that best meets local needs whilst ensuring that schemes are consistent and interoperable. It also contains measures to allow for the establishment of a new statutory body to represent the interests of bus and coach passengers in England.

Copies of the Government's response to the consultation, and other related documents, have been placed in the Vote Office, the Libraries of both Houses and are also available on the Department's website.

WALES

Framework Powers in the Local Transport Bill

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): I am pleased to inform the House that an explanatory memorandum explaining proposals for the use of framework powers in the Local Transport Bill is available today. Copies of which can be found in the Vote Office, Libraries of both Houses and at: www.walesoffice.gov.uk

WORK AND PENSIONS

Work Options Pilot Project

The Minister for Pensions Reform (Mr. Mike O'Brien): The Government are launching the face-to-face guidance pilot project which was announced as part of a package of measures in The Welfare Reform Green Paper, "A new deal for welfare: Empowering people to work" which was published in January 2006 and aimed at increasing the employment rates of people aged 50 and over. Further reference was made in the Pensions White Paper of May 2006 "Security in Retirement towards a New Pensions System" which re-emphasised the importance of providing information and communicating choices to individuals. The pilot project is being carried out to establish what information older people need and how they can access it in order to take an informed decision about work and retirement in later life. Existing services are not providing the information that older individuals tell us they need when considering options about working longer. The information will focus on the choices and opportunities available to older people to help them plan how and when to retire as well as making use of flexible working options to help them remain in work or work for longer. The expectation is that better information will support extended working lives. The pilots will be evaluated over the operating period to inform the development of good practice for Government and non-government organisations to use in the guidance that they offer older workers. Tenders were invited from a wide range of guidance and older people agencies and six contractors have been selected. The organisations that successfully tendered for the pilot are as follows:

Age Concern Training for Greater Mersey side and St Helen's

Guidance Services for North Yorkshire

Shaw Trust Ltd for Glasgow

The Life Academy for Rural Cambridgeshire, mid Bedfordshire and Bedford

British Chamber of Commerce for Birmingham

Manpower UK Ltd for Bridgend/Rhondda Cynon Taff

The contracts started in October 2007 and will be for an 18-month period concluding March 2009. The final report, publication and production of best practice guidance will be in 2009-10,

TREASURY

ECOFIN (9 October 2007)

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Alistair Darling): The Economic and Financial Affairs Council was held on 9 October in Luxembourg. The Financial Secretary to the Treasury attended for the UK. The items on the agenda were as follows:

Implementation of the Stability and Growth Pact

Ministers adopted a Commission recommendation to abrogate the Excessive Deficit Procedure of the United Kingdom under Article 104(12) of the Treaty, and a recommendation for the Czech Republic to take further action in order to end their Excessive Deficit, in accordance with Article 104(7) of the Treaty.

The UK supports a prudent interpretation of the Stability and Growth Pact (SGP) which takes into account the level of debt, the influence of the cycle and the level of public investment. The UK Government welcome the abrogation of the UK EDP.

Public Finances in the EMU

Following their discussion at ECOFIN in July, Ministers agreed Conclusions on the Commission's annual Public Finances Report and accompanying proposals aimed at improving the effectiveness of the preventive arm of the Stability and Growth Pact by effectively applying the revised Stability and Growth Pact.

Quality of Public Finances

Ministers adopted Conclusions on the role that the modernisation of public administration can play in enhancing competitiveness, delivering better services, achieving better value for money and ensuring the control of government expenditure. This follows the discussion at the September Informal ECOFIN in Lisbon, at which the UK welcomed the sharing of experience between Member States.

Developments on the economic and financial situation

Ministers discussed the current economic situation and disturbances in global financial markets, and the possible policy responses to the issues raised. The UK is committed to pursuing an effective, considered global response to these global financial market issues, and believes the Financial Stability Forum provides the best route to pursue these aims.

Better Regulation

Ministers agreed Conclusions on better regulation and its role in improving EU competitiveness. The UK welcomes the calls for further progress to be made both at Member State and EU level towards reducing administrative burdens in the EU.

Flexicurity

Ministers agreed Conclusions on the economic aspects of flexicurity, which welcomed the Commission's work on developing an approach towards shared principles to develop labour market flexibility alongside support by social systems. The UK believes that fiscal sustainability is critical in the face of Europe's changing demographics.

Dialogues with third countries

The Commission presented Ministers with an update on its ongoing dialogues with third countries, including the USA, Japan, China, India and Russia, and focused on the economic, financial and regulatory aspects of the discussions.

Financial Service— Clearing and Settlement

Ministers agreed Conclusions on Clearing and Settlement, which covered the ECB's proposed Target 2 Securities project, the implementation and functioning of the Code of Conduct, progress on removal of the Giovannini barriers and the ESCB/CESR standards. These initiatives are intended to address deficiencies in the European Clearing and Settlement landscape—an area where the Council has long been pressing for change. The UK welcomes progress in improving the European Clearing and Settlement landscape.

Financial Services - EU arrangements for Financial Stability

Ministers agreed Conclusions on the long-running discussion of how to take forward EU arrangements for financial stability. The UK strongly supports efforts to improve financial stability arrangements, including financial crisis management arrangements in Europe, by ensuring all Member States have robust national crisis management arrangements, and welcomes improvements to cross-border communication and co-operation in financial crises.

ECOFIN

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Alistair Darling): The Economic and Financial Affairs Council will be held on 13 November in Brussels. The items on the agenda are as follows:

Lisbon strategy: The new three-year cycle.

The next governance cycle for the Lisbon strategy will run for three years from 2008-2011. The Council will discuss draft conclusions on the next three-year cycle for the Lisbon strategy, prepared by the Economic Policy Committee. It will also take into account a recent European Commission communication prepared at the request of the 2007 Spring European Council.

Globalisation: Capital and labour flows.

The Council will exchange views on the basis of a report on the economic impact of migration prepared by the European Commission, taking into account a paper prepared by the Economic Policy Committee.

Statistics

The Council will be invited to agree conclusions on EU statistical matters, including the 2007 EFC status report on information requirements, the reduction of the statistical burden, EU statistical governance, and the communication of major statistical revisions, as prepared by the Economic and Financial Committee. The UK welcomes work to reduce the statistical burden on member states.

Taxation

a) VAT package

The Council will discuss a set of measures that will modernise the EU VAT rules for the cross-border supply of services, with particular focus on proposed changes to the rules for the telecoms, broadcasting and e-services sectors. The UK supports the modernisation of the EU VAT regime.

b) Green taxation: Passenger car related taxes.

Ministers will discuss Commission proposals for a new directive on linking car taxation to CO_2 emissions.

c) Reduced VAT rates

Ministers will discuss Commission proposals to extend until 2010 most of the new Member States' derogations for reduced VAT rates.

The UK Government are supportive of the proposal to extend most of the temporary derogations granted to those Member States that acceded to the European Union after 1 January 1995.

Global Navigation Satellite System (GALILEO): Financing aspects

Following the discussion at the July ECOFIN, there will be a further exchange of views on the financing of the Galileo project. The UK will continue to express concern with the Commission's financing proposal and argue that the option of reprioritising funds from existing programmes must be considered.

Presentation of the Annual Report by the Court of Auditors Concerning the Financial Year 2006.

The Council will receive a presentation from the European Court of Auditors on the 2006 general budget. This will be the first presentation that Ministers will hear on the 2006 budget, and will mark the start of the annual discharge process.

Double Taxation Convention (United Kingdom and Moldova)

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Jane Kennedy): A new Double Taxation Convention with Moldova was signed on 8 November 2007. After signature, the text of the Convention was deposited in the Libraries of both Houses and made available on HM Revenue and Customs' website. The text of the Convention will be scheduled to a draft Order in Council and laid before the House of Commons in due course.

CHILDREN, SCHOOLS AND FAMILIES

School Funding Settlement for 2008-09 to 2010-11

The Minister for Schools and Learners (Jim Knight): I am announcing today the first three year school funding settlement, for 2008-09 to 2010-11. This settlement and the capital settlement announced on 10 October will mean that, by 2011, total funding per pupil will have increased nationally to £6,600. Education spending is projected to rise as a proportion of GDP from 4.7 per cent. in 1996-67 to 5.6 per cent. by 2010-11. And for the first time, schools will have three year budgets, enabling them to plan further ahead, to take better long-term decisions, to use their budgets more efficiently and strategically over a three-year period.

On 25 June this year I announced to the House a package of measures for school funding for 2008-09 to 2010-11. The key features were: a continuation of the spend-plus methodology for DSG distribution, coupled with a fundamental formula review, to start in the new year; a minimum funding guarantee (MFG) dependent on average cost pressures, but with efficiency taken into account; further measures to broaden the membership of schools forums, particularly from early years and 14-19 stakeholders; a staged approach to the reform of early years funding; and additional funding for diplomas to be provided through a specific formula grant, with local discretion on how this funding is used to pay for provision.

This statement sets out the Government's decisions for the next three years on: the overall increase in schools funding, the dedicated schools grant (DSG) and other grants; details of funding for our key priorities; and the level of the MFG for schools. Details of allocations of both the DSG and specific grants to authorities and schools are being sent to local authorities today and I am placing copies in the Library of the House.

The overall level of schools funding will increase by 4.3 per cent. in 2008-09, 4.7 per cent. in 2009-10 and 5.3 per cent. in 2010-11. This includes funding for our key priorities: the personalisation of teaching and learning, support for all pupils to make good progress, the extension of the early years offer to parents, and extended children's services provided from schools. It also takes account of the additional costs of the expansion of the academies programme—our plans allow for a further 50 academies to be opened in each of the next three years, bringing the total to 230 academies open by September 2010.

The strong focus on personalising teaching and learning to the needs of every child will continue over the next three years, with additional sums of £330 million, 535 million and 912 million earmarked within DSG. This additional funding is to support universal roll-out of a personalised offer to all pupils—including those with special educational needs—and will be distributed on the basis of numbers of 5 to 15 year olds. In taking decisions on allocations, local authorities and their schools forums should consider our priorities: ensuring all children are making good progress; early intervention to prevent children from falling behind, especially those with special educational needs; targeted support for specific groups including those ethnic minorities at particular risk of poor outcomes, white working class children, children in care; and ensuring that the school workforce has the skills and confidence to address the needs of children from these groups.

To complement this increased funding through DSG, we will roll-out funding to help improve the rate at which children progress, ensuring all children can meet their potential, and those who are behind expectations, or are falling behind, get back on track. A current pilot of this approach will run until July 2009.

We will then make available £138 million in 2009-10, and £315 million in 2010-11 to improve progression in schools. By 2010-11, this funding will enable an additional 300,000 under-attaining pupils a year to benefit from 1:1 tuition in English, and a further 300,000 pupils in Maths. Taken together, we will be spending an additional £1.2 billion on personalisation and progression by 2010-11. There will be support for children who have fallen behind in basic literacy and numeracy through the national roll-out of "Every Child a Reader and Every Child Counts", with £79 million being made available in 2010-11 via the Standards Fund. Further funding will be announced shortly for the "Every Child a Writer" programme.

The increased funding for progression will be delivered through the Standards Fund for the next three years, as will increases in funding to extend the entitlement to free nursery education from 12½ to 15 hours, announced by the Minister for Children, Young People and Families, on 7 November, and for extended schools. Our aim is that from 2011-12 these funding allocations will be mainstreamed into the DSG. We will consider how this can best be achieved as we take forward work on implementing the funding system for 2011-12 and onwards, following the fundamental formula review which starts in January 2008.

Narrowing the attainment gap for pupils from disadvantaged backgrounds is one of the strategic objectives of my Department and is a key priority for the Government. The most significant attainment gap is between deprived and more affluent pupils—including those in generally affluent authorities. We are therefore allocating £40 million in each of the next three years to support children from deprived backgrounds who attend schools in less deprived local authorities whose overall level of deprivation is in the bottom third, as defined by our new indicator of income deprivation, based on tax credit data. Our strong expectation is that this additional funding will be directed to those schools with the most disadvantaged pupil intakes. Alongside this additional money for deprived children in less deprived authorities, we will continue to press all authorities to properly reflect in their local funding formulae the existing funding for deprivation delivered through DSG.

For authorities whose spending was below the formula in 2005-06, we have closed half of that gap over the past two years: we will complete this process over the next three years, with additional sums of £20 million, 40 million and 60 million.

Two further developments of the funding system take account of changing patterns of demography. First, all authorities will receive a minimum cash increase of at least 2 per cent. irrespective of their pupil numbers: that will particularly help those authorities where pupil numbers are rapidly declining. Secondly, for authorities experiencing rapid growth in pupil numbers, or a significant influx of children with English as an additional language, there will be an exceptional circumstances grant, paid out every autumn.

As well as the additional funding for ministerial priorities, we are continuing to provide all local authorities with increases for schools' core funding. I announced in June that the MFG would continue to deliver a minimum per pupil increase for all schools in each of the next three years, which would reflect average cost pressures. Our assessment of cost pressures includes an assumed efficiency gain of 1 per cent. for each of the next three years, reflecting the substantial improvement in efficiency which we expect to be achieved across the schools sector and the public sector as a whole. It is based on a cautious but realistic assessment of the wide range of pay and non-pay pressures that schools will face across the next three years.

The result is an MFG for all schools set at 2.1 per cent. for each of the next three years, which is affordable within the comprehensive spending review settlement, while allowing us to allocate significant additional funding increases to our key priorities. The settlement provides for the first time three years of funding allocations, and will help schools to plan how they will meet the range of cost pressures they face from pay and non-pay over this period as a whole.

The Department is working with our external partners, including representatives of headteachers and governors to develop support mechanisms for schools to help them make the best use of their resources to improve outcomes for pupils. The aim will be to provide schools with access to a range of support that is tailored to their individual circumstances, exemplifies good practice and provides opportunities for peer review and support. We will announce further details later in the year.

We have received the detailed recommendations of the STRB on teachers' pay from September 2008 and I am grateful to them for their work. We will be announcing our response to the STRB's report when we have carefully considered their detailed recommendations within the wider context of the Government's approach to public sector pay. We will ensure that the Government response to the STRB's recommendations is consistent with the MFG we are announcing today.

As we announced in June, all authorities will receive a basic increase in their DSG per pupil made up of: the MFG at 2.1/2.1/2.1 per cent. plus an additional 1.0/0.8/0.8 per cent. of headroom; each authority will therefore receive a basic increase of 3.1/2.9/2.9 per cent. Funding for ministerial priorities is equivalent to an additional 1.5/0,8/1.4 per cent. per pupil on average, giving an average increase in DSG per pupil for each year of 4.6/3.7/4.3 per cent.

Alongside the increases in DSG for all authorities we will increase direct funding to schools through the School Standards Grant (SSG) and School Standards Grant Personalisation (SSG (P)), in line with the level of the MFG. Each authority's allocation of School Development Grant will be increased in line with the MFG, and all schools are guaranteed the same cash allocation per pupil year on year: this will allow some updating of the distribution of this grant, while continuing to protect schools.

The Learning and Skills Council plans to announce increases in the funding rates for school sixth forms as well as the details of its new funding methodology, to be used for school sixth forms and other 16-18 provision, including transitional measures to smooth the introduction of the new formula. Sixth form funding will therefore no longer be taken into account when local authorities apply the MFG to schools with sixth forms. We will announce in December allocations of the specific formula grant to support the introduction of diplomas from September 2008. That will augment the £110 million we allocated through DSG in 2007-08 to support practical learning options. That funding is now part of the DSG baseline going forward and we expect local authorities to utilise it to support the roll out of diplomas.

This settlement builds on the foundations of the last ten years of rapid growth in school funding: every school and local authority will receive increases in funding per pupil each year; but every school will also face the challenge of making their funding work harder in support of our shared aims. On top of the basic increases there is significant additional funding to support our priorities: the personalisation of teaching and learning, support for all pupils to make good progress, the extension of the early years offer to parents, and extended children's services provided from schools. And a three year settlement supports schools as they take better informed, long term, strategic decisions.

DEFENCE

Defence Technology Plan

The Minister for the Armed Forces (Mr. Bob Ainsworth): The Ministry of Defence has today announced the development of the Defence Technology Plan (DTP), a cost-balanced list of Research and Development (R&D) priorities for the MOD. The DTP will build upon the Defence Technology Strategy (DTS), published in October 2006, and will provide clear direction to the R&D community, allowing industry and academia better to direct its investment in defence technology. Population of the DTP will continue throughout 2008.

The DTP will be a plan starting with capability driven research goals, showing how the goals will be met by R&D activity supporting later phases of acquisition.

The DTP will set out the R&D programme by presenting a number of high level R&D objectives in the form of technology roadmaps. Each R&D objective will be described in similar terms to allow the R&D board to provide strategic direction and oversight of the entire programme.

The DTP is being developed by R&D staff in consultation with the wider stakeholder community and will be owned by the Defence R&D Board. DTP will have a dynamic online format, allowing regular updates when necessary and will be available in three versions; a Government version available on internal networks, a defence industry version available to appropriately security cleared companies and a public version available on the internet.

HEALTH

Figures on Delayed Discharges

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Ivan Lewis): In response to questions from the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb), the Department placed tables in the Library on 29 October containing the numbers of patients in hospitals whose discharge had been delayed, and the total and the total number of bed nights in each hospital trust lost as a result of such delays, Official Report, column 1030W.

Following further investigation of the data collection and reporting systems used to compile that information I have to report that the information published contained significant errors that overstated the numbers in each category.

Contrary to the impression given by the original inaccurate tables and subsequent media reports, the situation is that bed days lost because of delayed discharges have decreased by approximately 5 per cent. in the past year. The revised information is available in the Library.

Electronic Patient Record

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): The Government have today laid before Parliament their response to the Health Select Committee report on the electronic patient record and its use (Cm 7264).

In the response, the Government welcome the Committee's findings on the potential of electronic patient records to improve health care services and patient safety. While significant progress has already been made, it is recognised that some parts of the National Programme for IT in the National Health Service have been subject to delay. The Government also recognise that continuing effort is needed to engage with front-line NHS staff and to communicate the programme plans to the public.

The response is available in the Library.

LEADER OF THE HOUSE

Topical Debates

The Leader of the House of Commons (Ms Harriet Harman): The House recently approved (25 October 2007) the introduction of topical debates, as recommended by the Select Committee on Modernisation in its report, "Revitalising the Chamber: the role of the back bench Member"[1]. This will extend the opportunities in the Chamber to discuss topical issues of regional, national or international importance. Topical debates will last for 90 minutes and take place on a weekly basis.

A Member seeking such a debate may do so in the following ways:

In writing to the Leader of the House of Commons;

Via the email link on the home page of the website of the Leader of the House of Commons at: www.commonsleader.gov.uk;

By requesting a topical debate during the weekly Business Questions; and

In person to the Leader of the House of Commons.

Following discussions, the House will be notified of the subject selected, either during the announcement of business on Thursday or through the Order Paper, depending on the date chosen for the debate. The subject will appear on the annunciator alongside other business

As agreed by the House, the motion for these debates will be "That this House has considered [the matter of XXX]" and will not be amendable. The debates will be subject to limits on speeches as agreed by the House.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Remploy

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mrs. Anne McGuire): We have today received Remploy's final modernisation proposals. Good progress was made during the consultation period under the chairmanship of Roger Poole, and although the negotiations concluded with a formal failure to agree, we feel there has been real dialogue between the company and their trade unions and progress on both sides. We also expect to receive further representations from the trade unions representing the Remploy workers.

The talks identified some important common ground, in particular:

Agreement on the overall funding envelope of £555 million over five years.

The need for both employment services and factory provision.

Fewer factory closures.

The importance of gaining more public sector contracts.

The importance of local initiatives in securing the future of Remploy factories by winning more public and private contracts, led by factory managers, trade unions, constituency MPs and other local stakeholders.

The need to reduce management and other overhead costs.

The need to improve working practices, saving £10 million over five years.

The need to dramatically improve industrial relations.

Ministers have committed that Remploy's revised proposals will receive full ministerial scrutiny before any final decision. We will therefore study them in detail before making a further statement to the House in due course.

TREASURY

National Insurance Contributions Bill

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Kitty Ussher): I have published today the Impact Assessment for the National Insurance Contributions Bill. Copies are available in the Vote Office, Printed Paper Office and have also been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

The National Insurance Contributions Bill will ensure that the Government can implement one of the reforms announced in the Budget 07 personal tax package, creating by 2009-10 a personal tax system which has two income bands covering both income tax and NICs.

The Bill will also include changes to the State Second Pension following the announcement by the Chancellor in the pre-Budget report. It was announced that the Government will bring forward the introduction of the Upper Accruals Point in 2009.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Education, Youth and Culture Council

The Minister of State, Department for Culture, Media and Sport (Margaret Hodge): The Education, Youth and Culture Council will be held on 15-16 November in Brussels. Anne Lambert, UK Deputy Permanent Representative, will be representing the UK on 16 November when Culture issues will be taken. Education issues will be taken on 15 November.

The first item on the agenda will be a report from the presidency on the first meeting of the EU-Russia Permanent Partnership Council on Culture which was held on 25 October 2007. This meeting was to discuss the future priorities for cultural co-operation between the two partners. The presidency is expected to present the outcome of the meeting to the Council and the Declaration that was agreed.

The presidency will then seek the adoption of the Council Resolution on a European agenda for culture in a globalising world. The Commission published a Communication in June of this year which examined the role of culture in Europe and how the European Union can add value to this. Following the publication of this Communication, the Portuguese presidency proposed a draft Council Resolution setting out the member states' response to the issues raised by the Commission. Working Group discussions have resolved the UK's concerns with the Resolution, notably, acknowledging that culture is essentially a matter for member states, that participation in the Open Method of Co-ordination on any given work strand will be voluntary and that the results will be non-binding. The Council is expected to adopt the Resolution and I intend to endorse this course of action.

The Council will then be invited to adopt a decision on the selection of two cities to host the European Capital of Culture event for 2011. Estonia and Finland are the EU member states nominating cites for this event and have put forward Tallinn and Turku respectively. I intend to support this proposal.

Under Any Other Business, the presidency will provide feedback on expert conferences in the field of culture and information on forthcoming events. The Commission will give information on the EU-China declaration in the field of culture and education. I do not foresee any need to intervene on any of these items.

DEFENCE

Afghanistan

The Minister for the Armed Forces (Mr. Bob Ainsworth): With the expiry of the call-out order made last October, a new order has been made under Section 54 of the Reserve Forces Act 1996 to enable Reservists to continue to be called out into service to support operations in Afghanistan. The new order is effective until 11 November 2008. Reservists are making a valuable contribution to operations in that country and some 700 reservists are currently called out in support of the operation.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Tidal Surge

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Hilary Benn): Further to my report to the House last Thursday, 8 November 2007, column 365, volume 467, I would like to provide an update on the significant tidal surge which affected the coast of Eastern England last week.

On 5 November, the Met Office's storm tide forecasting service alerted us to a possible tidal surge in the North Sea later on in the week. By Thursday, it had become clear that there was a significant risk of potentially serious flooding in coastal areas of eastern England during the next 48 hours and the Environment Agency issued a number of severe flood warnings. Police Gold Commands were established in Norfolk, Suffolk and Essex to co-ordinate the emergency response to any flooding, including evacuation where necessary and in line with the standing emergency arrangements, the Government's COBR committee was convened to ensure that all preparations were in place.

The Thames Barrier was closed as a precaution. High volume pumps were sent to the area and 21 water rescue teams were on stand-by to carry out rescue if needed. The Environment Agency also moved temporary barriers across country overnight from Worcestershire and erected them to protect an electricity sub-station in Great Yarmouth.

The peak of the surge passed down the eastern coast on Friday morning. Tides at Great Yarmouth were the highest they have been since the dreadful flooding of 1953. Fortunately, however, the surge levels were around 20cm lower than originally predicted and the wind direction more favourable than anticipated. While there were some relatively minor breaches and overtopping at individual locations along the coast, the defences performed well, few homes were flooded and thankfully no lives were lost. People have now returned to their homes.

A similar picture is emerging from other southern North Sea countries which were also affected by the surge.

We will need time to assess the impact of the flooding on the natural environment and biodiversity, notably the flooding of coastal marshes and saline intrusion into the Norfolk Broads and sensitive sites on the Suffolk coast. The Environment Agency are working with Natural England and the RSPB, but the full extent of any impact will not be known for some weeks.

That we did not witness similar scenes to 1953 is in no small part due to the commitment of successive Governments, over many years, which have invested considerable sums of money in strengthening both coastal and inland flood defences and established the sophisticated flood forecasting and warning systems which gave us crucial time to prepare. That investment included the Thames Barrier which provides a high degree of protection—and hence confidence—to London.

The operational handling of any event is vital, and the emergency services, local authorities, Environment Agency, Met Office, and others acted swiftly to warn those at risk and initiate precautionary evacuation. This is testament to the effective emergency planning arrangements we have in place which are tested regularly at local, regional and national level.

I would like to place on record my personal appreciation to all those who worked so hard during this incident, and for the public's co-operation at what have must been a very distressing time for those affected.

In contrast to the devastating impact of the 1953 floods, widespread flooding was avoided on this occasion. However we must remain vigilant to the risk of further such events.

Foot and Mouth/Blue Tongue Disease

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Hilary Benn): I would like to update the House on the Foot and Mouth and Bluetongue outbreaks further to my oral statement to the House on 8 October 2007, column 39, volume 464.

A number of changes have been made to the measures put in place as a result of Foot and Mouth disease and restrictions have been significantly relaxed.

On 17 October, following extensive surveillance work and veterinary risk assessment, the Protection Zone around the infected premises and all movement restrictions outside the Risk Area were lifted, resulting in the removal of all movement restrictions for most parts of the country. This was extended further when on 21October the Risk Area was reduced and became a 10km Restricted Zone around the areas where surveillance was continuing.

Finally, on 5 November the Surveillance Zone was lifted, and while the Restricted Zone remains in place, the movement restrictions within the zone have been relaxed.

These changes have taken place as part of a plan to phase out restrictions as soon as possible once the disease situation and risk assessment allows. Extensive surveillance has now been carried out in a large area surrounding Pirbright and the infected premises and no further cases of foot and mouth have been found. This has resulted in a return to pre 3 August movement rules in most of the country.

I am also able to confirm that the restrictions on intra-community trade have been significantly relaxed. On 12 October the European Commission supported a Decision which allowed meat and meat products to be exported from a significant portion of Great Britain to other EU Member States, subject to conditions. The area from which these exports could take place was subsequently increased on 19 October and the conditions for exporting meat and meat products were eased slightly. These decisions were a welcome relief for many in the farming and exporting industries and demonstrated the confidence the Commission have in the measures we have taken to eradicate foot and mouth through our extensive surveillance and epidemiological work.

On 6 November, the EU agreed a further Decision relating to the export of meat and meat product from Great Britain. This new Decision will further relax the restrictions on exports for a large proportion of Great Britain much earlier than expected. This is a significant step in returning to business as usual and will go some way to relieve the pressures on our farming industries at this difficult time. It will also allow some of the industry to take advantage of seasonal export opportunities.

This Decision is expected to come into force later in November, and the current FMD Restricted Zone will fall when this occurs. The decision will split the country into three areas; an area in the south-east where no exports will be allowed, an area around this where exports will be restricted and the rest of Great Britain, where pre-foot and mouth conditions will be restored provided exporters supply certification.

I welcome the new Commission Decision. However, in order to comply with the decision, and to preserve the status of those animals that are eligible for export, it will be necessary to apply conditions to live animal movements out of the area where exports are banned or restricted. Live animal movements will continue to be allowed from this area, but we will have to apply a level of control that protects our export status in the rest of Great Britain. We are very much aware of the impact of re-imposing conditions on movements and are working closely with the Industry Stakeholder Core Group and other stakeholders to ensure that an effective solution can be implemented. We will make every effort to minimise the impact of these changes on the farming industries and limit the red tape. The Commission Decision will remain in force until the end of the year.

I understand the difficulties that this may pose for some; however these changes will have overall benefits for farming businesses across the country, particularly on market prices. We will continue to work with the EU to ensure that the export market remains open and that the remaining restrictions are removed as soon as is practicable. Maintaining the support of the Commission and other Member States is crucial as we work towards securing FMD disease freedom at international (OIE) level.

In my last statement I announced a package of assistance worth £12.5 million aimed at supporting those most severely affected by the recent events. Implementation of all elements of the package is well underway and some are almost completed.

The bulk of the assistance to hill farmers has now been paid. Approximately £7.4 million had been paid out by the end of October, with the total now processed standing at £8.3 million. The rest of the payments are expected to be made by the end of December. Also, the arrangements for Fallen Stock Scheme for farmers in the risk area have been put in place. Take up of the Scheme has been limited, suggesting that farmers in the Restricted Zone have found alternative outlets for their stock. The scheme is due to close when the current Restricted Zone is lifted, which is expected to be on 15 November at the earliest.

The Arthur Rank Centre has started disbursing the funds I allocated to the farming charities (up to £1 million) to help those struggling to cope. The money is going to the charities in the Farming Help Partnership and, via the Farm Crisis Network, to local support groups doing similar work alongside them in certain areas of the country. A sum of £500,000 has already been transferred to the Arthur Rank Centre. A report on activities and the impact of this funding will come forward in mid-December.

We have received proposals from the Meat and Livestock Commission (MLC) regarding the £2 million for promotion and marketing of lamb, beef and pork. The first payment of £250,000 has been made and lamb promotion additional to that already being carried out using levy payers' funds has started. In this context the demand for lamb from our European colleagues is proving strong. Additional beef promotion will start later this month. Preparatory work has started for promoting third country exports of pork once we have regained OIE freedom, and additional domestic pork promotion will start in January as the current levy funded campaign ends.

In relation to the Pirbright site, since 7 September the Health and Safety Executive and DEFRA have carried out further joint inspections, and work on the Improvement Plan is well underway. All essential work will need to be completed at the Pirbright site before full operations can recommence at all its facilities. However, remedial work has been carried out at the site and extensively tested including work on the effluent pipes identified in the HSE report. HSE and DEFRA inspectors have reviewed the results together with other improvements at the site (including operating procedures) and have concluded that it is safe for vaccine production to recommence.

Therefore, on 6 November, DEFRA restored the Specified Animal Pathogens Order (SAPO) licence to Merial Animal Health to permit the use of FMD and Bluetongue viruses for vaccine production, following further extensive inspections, tests and documentary evidence. DEFRA and HSE inspectors were satisfied that Merial can comply with all of the required licence conditions and have in place all the necessary measures to ensure strict biosecurity throughout the site.

Turning to the situation on bluetongue, current evidence suggests that the disease is broadly contained within the Protection Zone. Up until winter we can expect to continue to see further cases in this area due to local animal movements and spread via midges, as well as sporadic cases outside this zone. These cases will continue to be reflected where necessary with adjustments to the boundaries of the zones.

We are continuing to monitor our approach to the control of this disease as well as decisions on zones and movement controls in discussion with industry. This disease is quite different to FMD and it is important that decisions on control are taken by the industry, and not just by Ministers. Our objective, agreed with the industry, remains to contain the disease within the currently affected areas.

I very much recognise the growing economic pressures on those farmers caught within the zones. Animals are allowed to move within the zones. From 14 October, in discussion with industry, we allowed markets to take place within the zones and animals to go to slaughter at specified slaughterhouses outside the zones. Animals have been allowed to move through the zones since 18 October

New EU rules came into force on 1 November which created a clearer and more harmonised approach to dealing with this disease. One immediate effect was to change the name of the zones, so that they now mirror the zones used for other diseases. The new rules required us to apply some new conditions to permitted movements. We accepted the views of the industry that the requirement for pre-notification of movements was administratively burdensome and have taken this up with the Commission. In the meantime we are not applying this condition.

We continue to discuss with industry on a regular basis, whether we should move to the next stage of our control strategy which would see the UK as a single large zone. However, current analysis of the epidemiology and cost benefit of such a move indicates that the potential benefits of trying to control the spread of disease still outweigh the costs. We are working with delivery partners and the industry to seek urgent solutions to problems that are occurring with welfare and movements to winter grazing out of the Protection Zone.

We are developing our surveillance strategy to determine disease spread and to plan for the possibility that the disease may re-emerge next year. With that in mind, on 1 November DEFRA issued a tender for between 10 to 20 million doses of bluetongue vaccine. No suitable vaccine is currently available for the strain of bluetongue circulating in England. However, several companies have vaccines under development and these are expected to be available from next summer. In keeping with the principles of our control strategy which we published in August, we are developing a detailed vaccination plan for approval by the European Commission and livestock keepers will be offered the opportunity to purchase vaccine from the bank. I am sure the benefits of vaccination will make real economic sense to many farmers. The vaccination plan is being developed with scientific experts (including those external to DEFRA), representatives of the farming industry and others. Discussions are also continuing on possible approaches to vaccination with the European Commission and other Member States affected by bluetongue.

Although we are approaching the end of the vector season, it is vital that farmers in the zones continue to be vigilant, and for the sake of their industry, continue to report all suspicion of disease.

This has been an especially difficult period for the farming industry, as well as individual farmers and their families. I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to all those from Government bodies, charities, and the farming community who have gone to great lengths to control these outbreaks. I would also like to thank Debby Reynolds, the Chief Veterinary Officer, who has decided to take early retirement. I am extremely grateful for Debby's advice and hard work on behalf of the Department both during the recent animal disease outbreaks and over the years. I wish her all the very best in her future career. Fred Landeg has been appointed as CVO in the interim.

I will continue to keep the House informed of developments.

LEADER OF THE HOUSE

Topical Debate

The Leader of the House of Commons (Ms Harriet Harman): The first subject of topical debate on Thursday 15 November 2007 will be immigration.

WOMEN AND EQUALITY

Equality

The Minister for Women and Equality (Ms Harriet Harman): I am pleased to announce that the Government are publishing today, and making copies available in both Houses, their response to the report on equality of the House of Commons Communities and Local Government Committee, published on 2 August 2007.

I am determined to carry forward, with my colleagues in Government, an equality strategy that builds on the substantial advances we have already achieved: for example, closing the gender pay gap from 17.4 per cent. in 1997 to 12.6 per cent. in 2007; enabling 18,000 civil partnerships to be formed in the first year following legislation; banning discrimination against people of any sexual orientation and people of different religions or who do not have a religion, when they want to buy or access goods or services and when they are at work; banning age discrimination in the workplace; establishing the Equality and Human Rights Commission.

Yet persistent inequalities remain. In responding to the Committee's report and specific recommendations, the Government also set out their direction of travel on equality, including progress on the Equalities Public Service Agreement, the Equality Bill, women's priorities and their intention to develop an equality strategy that builds on the findings of the Equalities Review.

COMMUNITIES AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT

Floods

The Minister for Local Government (John Healey): Local authorities were central to the response to the flooding that occurred this summer which caused widespread damage to homes, businesses and key public services. With around 48,000 homes affected and damage to schools and roads, councils remain central to the recovery operations and some may struggle to meet key service targets such as waste collection, recycling and decent homes.

Therefore, I am announcing plans today to ensure that councils severely affected by this summer's floods will not be unfairly penalised through the local performance framework. To ensure our approach is clear, consistent and transparent, I am publishing a statement of principles, which is set out below.

I want to ensure that local authorities and partners are able to concentrate on flood recovery whilst continuing to deliver the best service they can to their citizen. The Government will adopt this to enable departments and inspectorates to take into account evidence showing temporary dips in performance resulting from the flooding against an improving trend or previous good performance.

However, we are also clear that maintaining momentum on existing improvements is important, especially as we introduce the new local performance framework and indicator set over the next year. For this reason we will not make general revisions to targets for the flooded areas. The process for agreeing any flexibilities will be transparent and clear.

Statement of Principles - Guidelines for considering performance management flexibilities

While performance management flexibilities will need to be agreed on a case-by-case basis with each area, the following are some broad principles to inform the engagement with authorities affected by floods:

Main principles

1. Where the impact of the floods results in an unusual strain being placed on local authorities and their partners, Government Departments and the relevant inspectorates will recognise this when considering performance assessment data. In particular we would expect common sense to be used when reacting to any temporary dips in performance against an improving trend or previous good performance.

2. Nonetheless, the best value duty to secure continuous improvement still applies and citizens have a right to expect that disruption to services will be minimised as far as possible. So, we would only expect flexibilities to be agreed in areas significantly affected by flooding and where clear evidence can be demonstrated as to why flexibilities are necessary.

3. Sound information remains a critical underpinning to understanding and managing performance, so authorities should continue to measure and report on their performance.

4. Negotiation of new Local Area Agreements from autumn 2007 to spring 2008 will not be delayed. Individual authorities may wish to discuss with their GO any additional support they may need to do this.

5. In line with practice in other cases where the performance of authorities and partners has been affected by events beyond their control, we cannot agree to renegotiate the targets against which reward grant is paid, either from Local Public Service Agreements or the reward element of Local Area Agreements.

6. However, we are looking at the possibility of allowing some flexibility in terms of assessment of performance attained if affected by flooding. This would be done through provision of direct evidence to independent assessors that a target would have been met in full or the threshold for reward attainment exceeded if flooding had not occurred. This would not result in adjustment of a target; rather, a change in the performance judged to have occurred.

Handling procedures

1. GO Locality Managers will be the channel for any discussions held between relevant departments, inspectorates and local authorities to achieve agreement on individual issues.

2. Inspectorates are responsible for the independent judgements they make and the methodologies on which they do so. It will therefore be for them to determine what reasonable flexibilities they can agree, within the boundaries of the principles outlined above. This might include cancelling or rescheduling an inspection, or taking account of the impacts of the flooding in reaching any judgements.

3. While we recognise the impacts of flooding can take several years to fully repair, we believe performance management flexibilities should be limited to the period that authorities are dealing with the immediate impacts and setting up their longer term arrangements. Therefore, we would expect flexibilities to be limited to within the financial year 2007-08 (recognising that this also covers inspections and assessments made in 2008-09 using 2007-08 data).

HOME DEPARTMENT

Protective Security

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Jacqui Smith): My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced in his statement on 25 July 2007, column 841, volume 463, a review by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Security and Counter-Terrorism (Lord West) of how best we protect crowded places, transport infrastructure and critical national infrastructure from terrorist attack.

This review has been completed and shows that a substantial amount of work has been undertaken or is under-way to increase levels of protective security in each of these three areas. It also identifies areas where further improvements could be made but recognises that we must ensure that protective security measures are proportionate to the risk.

We need to ensure that individuals and businesses are free to carry on our normal social, economic and democratic activities and, as a result, there will always be some vulnerability to terrorist attack. I do not intend to publish the review because I do not wish in any way to compromise our security. But I can mention some of the main points.

Crowded Places

Lord West has concluded that we need to make further improvements in reducing the vulnerability of crowded places to terrorist attack. This will be done by publishing next year, after further consultation, a new strategic national framework to encourage greater partnership working at the local level between local authorities, other local partners and in particular businesses. This will build on existing local partnerships such as Crime and Disorder Reduction Partnerships, and help local partners to incorporate counter-terrorist security advice into their existing work to improve community safety.

Local police Counter-Terrorism Security Advisers (CTSAs) already provide general counter-terrorism protective security advice in person to businesses, communities and other stakeholders. The Government will strengthen their work by investing a further £1.5 million in Counter-Terrorism Security Adviser posts from April 2008 which will enable more protective security advice to be provided at the local level to both the public and private sector.

We are also raising the profile of protective security at a local level by including an indicator on "Protection against terrorist attack" in the Single Set of National Indicators for Local Authorities and Local Authority Partnerships (published on 11 October). Following consultation, we intend to bring into effect during 2008-09 a standard way for police Counter Terrorism Security Advisers to assess vulnerability and other relevant factors which will enable local partnerships to prioritise their work and assess progress.

Professional protective security guidance is a crucial part of this approach. The police National Counter-Terrorist Security Office (NaCTSO) has already produced guides to improving protective security by business sector. Guides aimed at sports stadia, pubs, clubs and bars, shopping centres and high streets and visitor attractions have been produced and distributed to businesses in these sectors and copies are available from www.nactso.gov.uk.

Other protective security guidance for cinemas and theatres, restaurants and hotels and the education and health sectors will be produced by April 2008. Guidance for major events (which will include open air events and festivals) religious sites/places of worship and commercial centres will be produced by July 2008.

In addition, we will make improvements to the planning process, as identified by the hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer), in his contribution to the review so that more is done to protect buildings from terrorism from the design stage onwards. For example, new initiatives have been identified with the support of relevant professional bodies to raise the awareness and skills of architects, planners and police Architectural Liaison Officers in relation to counter-terrorism protective security.

Transport infrastructure

The review has acknowledged the effectiveness of the security programme that has already been implemented across the transport sector. This focuses on delivering security measures that help protect the travelling public and transport staff and facilities from terrorism threats, without impacting disproportionately on how the industry operates. While the regulated operators themselves deliver and fund these security measures, the Government regulate what these measures need to be. The report acknowledges the proportionality and practicality of our requirements and the extent to which the industry is involved in their development, as well as the challenges implicit in the "user pays" principle.

The report notes the significance of particular areas of work under-way. In particular, the Government will issue further guidance to the aviation industry on measures that can be taken to provide an appropriate level of protective security at entry points to airports and terminals. We will also accelerate work to deliver better measures to protect railway stations from the risk of a vehicle attack. The Government's Multi-Agency Threat and Risk Assessment (MATRA) approach that we employ across a range of transport modes will ensure that measures are co-ordinated efficiently.

Critical National Infrastructure (CNI)

The review showed that there is a high standard of protection of the critical national infrastructure from the threat of terrorism. Security specialists such as the Centre for the Protection of National Infrastructure (CPNI) are working effectively with Government Departments and the private sector to provide a proportionate level of protective security response commensurate with the different types of threat and risks affecting the CNI.

Nevertheless, the review has identified some specific improvements which could be made to the way in which we protect the CNI. For example, we intend to build on work already under-way to implement a modernised approach to identifying and categorising critical infrastructure which takes full account of information networks as well as physical assets and of the interdependencies across sectors. This will enable better prioritisation and most effective use of resources in order to deliver security improvements across the national infrastructure where they are most needed.

The new approach will be in use across the majority of sectors by the start of the next financial year (2008-09). In addition, further CPNI work on measures to protect against vehicle borne attack will be accelerated, and new research initiatives progressed.

LEADER OF THE HOUSE

Legislative Programme

The Leader of the House of Commons (Ms Harriet Harman): I am pleased to announce I am publishing today "The Government's Draft Legislative Programme—Taking a Wider View".

TRANSPORT

Aviation Security

The Secretary of State for Transport (Ruth Kelly): The restriction on the number of cabin bags which passengers are permitted to carry onto an aircraft (the 'one-bag rule') was introduced following the August 2006 security alert. The alleged plot to bomb aircraft on transatlantic flights highlighted a new method of terrorist attack, using relatively small amounts of liquids and other components.

It was clear that in the wake of this new danger, we needed a new regime that would prevent dangerous liquids being taken on board aircraft—and yet would be practical to implement, while also ensuring that security levels would not be compromised. As a result screeners would be looking for a substantially bigger range of potentially dangerous items.

We were clear from the beginning, though, that the one-bag rule was a temporary arrangement—and that the one-bag rule would change once the industry had demonstrated its ability to screen passengers and bags to an acceptable standard, in the light of the new threat.

We have assessed the effectiveness of the one-bag rule over the past year, considering airport investment in new screening technologies, and the improvements that extra security staff and new procedures have made at selected airports around the country.

I am announcing today a new approach to hand baggage security that will be introduced progressively as airports are ready to handle the extra capacity, so we can pass the benefits on to the passenger as quickly as possible.

We are inviting each airport to submit plans to take advantage of new technology, operational innovations, and unexploited capacity in the system to make a real difference to passengers as soon as possible.

Because airports are so busy at Christmas, the earliest date that airports will be able to introduce a new approach to hand luggage will be 7 January 2008. I hope to see rapid progress across the whole country—with all airports submitting plans over the next few months.

This is not about relaxing security; it is about allowing airports to take advantage of smarter technologies and improved processes to deliver a better service to the passenger.

Written Ministerial Statements

TREASURY

Double Taxation Convention (Slovenia)

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Jane Kennedy): A new Double Taxation Convention with Slovenia was signed on 13 November 2007. After signature, the text of the Convention was deposited in the Libraries of both Houses and made available on HM Revenue and Customs' website. The text of the Convention will be scheduled to a draft Order in Council and laid before the House of Commons in due course.

Departmental Expenditure (ONS)

The Exchequer Secretary to the Treasury (Angela Eagle): Subject to Parliamentary approval of any necessary Supplementary Estimate, the Office for National Statistics' total departmental expenditure limit (DEL) will be increased by £941,000 from £174,237,000 to £175,178,000, and the administration budget will be increased by £1,491,000.

Within the DEL change, the impact on resources and capital is as set out in the following table:

	Change		New DEL
	Voted	Non-Voted	Voted	Non-Voted	Total
Resource DEL	941	-	162,504	7,027	169,531
Of which:

Less Depreciation	-	-	-21,933	-	-21,933
Total	941	-	168,151	7,027	175,178

*The total of 'Administration Budget' and 'Near-cash in Resource DEL' figures may well be greater than total resource DEL, due to the definitions overlapping.
Capital DEL includes items treated as resource in Estimates and accounts but which are treated as Capital DEL in budgets.
† Depreciation, which forms part of resource DEL, is excluded from the total DEL since capital DEL includes capital spending and to include depreciation of those assets would lead to double counting.

The change in the resource element of DEL arises from:

Take up of End-Year Flexibility (EYF) of £777,000 from the Invest to Save Budget as set out in the Public Outturn White Paper (CM 7156); and Transfer of £164,000 from the Cabinet Office in respect of Civil Service statistics.

The change in the administration budget arises from the take up of administration DEL EYF of £777,000 from the Invest to Save Budget, the transfer of £164,000 from the Cabinet Office and a reclassification, from programme to admin, of £550,000 EU expenditure.

Departmental Expenditure Limits (Treasury)

The Exchequer Secretary to the Treasury (Angela Eagle): Subject to Parliamentary approval of any necessary Supplementary Estimate, HM Treasury's total Departmental Expenditure Limit (DEL) will be increased by £6,028,000 from £223,420,000 to £229,448,000. Within the total DEL change, the impact on resources and capital is set out in the following table:

	Change		New DEL

[1] The total of 'Administration budget' and 'Near cash in Resource DEL' figures may well be greater than total Resource DEL, due to definitions overlapping.
[2] Capital DEL includes items treated as resource in Estimates and accounts but which are treated as Capital DEL in budgets.
[3] Depreciation, which forms part of Resource DEL, is excluded from the total DEL since Capital DEL includes capital spending and to include depreciation of those assets would lead to double counting.

The change in the resource element of the DEL arises from:

A Machinery of Government transfer of £4,028,000 (within the administration budget) from the Cabinet Office in respect of the transfer of the Prime Minister's Delivery Unit to HM Treasury;

Draw down of £2,000,000 (within the administration budget) from the Financial Inclusion Fund to finance the Thoresen Review;

Take up of Departmental Unallocated Provision of £8,491,000 for OGC structural exits—a transfer from non-voted to voted spending within DEL.

Departmental Expenditure (Revenue and Customs)

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Jane Kennedy): Subject to parliamentary approval of any necessary supplementary estimate, the HM Revenue & Customs total DEL will be increased by £76,487,000 from £4,547,630,000 to £4,624,117,000. Within the total DEL change, the impact on resources and capital are as set out in the following table:

[2]Capital DEL includes items treated as resource in Estimates and accounts but which are treated as Capital DEL in budgets.
[3]Depreciation, which forms part of resource DEL, is excluded from the total DEL since capital DEL includes capital spending and to include depreciation of those assets would lead to double counting.

The change in the resource element of DEL arises from:

£44,500,000 administration costs, from the Modernisation Fund to modernise and transform HMRC.

£30,000,000 administration near cash costs, from the DEL Reserve to expand call centre capacity.

£1,587,000 administration near cash costs transferred from the Cabinet Office in respect of Parliamentary Counsel Office Funding.

£1,400,000 take up of end year flexibility (EYF) in accordance with the Public Expenditure Outturn White Paper (CM 7156). This is from programme expenditure EYF, agreed to be spent as administration costs.

£1,000,000 programme near cash expenditure transferred to the Serious Organised Crime Agency (SOCA).

The change in the administration budget arises from the changes detailed in the resource element above excluding the £1,000,000 programme transfer to SOCA.

BUSINESS, ENTERPRISE AND REGULATORY REFORM

Departmental Expenditure (DBRR)

The Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform (Mr. John Hutton): Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the Department for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform's DEL will be reduced by £3,748,144,000 from £7,144,961,000 to £3,396,817,000 and the administration budget will be increased by £9,740,000 from £316,969,000 to £326,709,000.

Within the DEL change, the impact on resources and capital is as set out in the following table:

Postal Services Commission

The Postal Services Commission net cash requirement will be increased by £1,517,000 from £1,000 to £1,518,000. There is no impact on resource or capital DEL as set out in the following table:

				New DEL

[2]Capital DEL includes items treated as resource in Estimates and accounts but which are treated as Capital DEL in budgets.
[3]Depreciation, which forms part of resource DEL, is excluded from the total DEL since capital DEL includes capital spending and to include depreciation of those assets would lead to double counting.

The change in the net cash requirement is a result of a forecast decrease in end-year creditors which is higher than the original forecast in the Main Estimate.

Office of Gas and Electricity Markets

Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the Office of Gas and Electricity Market's DEL will be increased by £1,000 from £1,651,000 to £1,652,000 and the administration budget will be increased by £211,000 from £491,000 to £702,000.

[3]Depreciation, which forms part of resource DEL, is excluded from the total DEL since capital DEL includes capital spending and to include depreciation of those assets would lead to double counting.

The change in the resource element of the DEL arises from a token increase in administration costs to cover an increase of £356,000 in expenditure offset by an increase of £355,000 in A. Additionally there is a reclassification of £210,000 from programme to administration costs.

There is no change in the capital element of the DEL.

CHILDREN, SCHOOLS AND FAMILIES

Departmental Expenditure (DCSF)

The Secretary of State for Children, Schools and Families (Ed Balls): Subject to Parliamentary approval of any necessary Supplementary Estimate, the Department for Children, Schools and Families Departmental Expenditure Limit (DEL) will be decreased by £14,106,193,000 from £64,665,498,000 to £50,559,305,000, the administration cost budget will be decreased by £45,221,000 from £237,698,000 to £192,477,000. The Office for Standards in Education, Children's Services and Skills (OFSTED) which has a separate Estimate and DEL, will be increased by £16,790,000 from £205,000,000 to £221,790,000 the administration cost budget will be increased by £485,000 from £28,470,000 to £28,955,000.

EU Youth Council

The Minister for Children, Young People and Families (Beverley Hughes): The Deputy UK Permanent Representative, Anne Lambert, will attend the Youth Council on 16 November. The agenda items are as follows:

Ministers will be asked to adopt a Resolution on implementing common objectives for voluntary activities of young people. The Resolution reflects one of the thematic priorities of the ongoing Open Method of Coordination for youth and also contributes to the joint Presidency priorities for 2007-08 of better social and professional integration of young people. The UK is broadly in favour of this document as it currently stands and particularly supports its emphasis on the positive contribution many young people make to society.

Ministers are expected to agree Conclusions on a transversal approach to youth policy. The Conclusions call for a more cross-cutting, mainstreaming approach to youth policy across education and employment in the context of the Lisbon Agenda. The UK supports this approach.

There will be an exchange of views on better consideration of youth issues in the implementation of the Lisbon strategy and implementing the European Youth Pact. The UK believes that the Youth Pact is best implemented through the National Reform Programmes and is anxious to avoid any additional burdens around youth-specific reporting.

Within the DEL change, the impact on resources and capital are as set out in the following table:

[1]Depreciation, which forms part of resource DEL, is excluded from the total DEL since capital DEL includes capital spending and to include depreciation of those assets would lead to double counting.

The change in the resource element of the DEL arises from: (i) a transfer of £26,800,000 to the Department for Innovation, Universities and Skills for the BREW programme; (ii) a transfer of £7,994,000 to the Forestry Commission for Farm Woodland Schemes; (iii) a transfer of £4,039,000 administration costs to the Department for Communities and Local Government for Government Office Funding; (iv) a transfer of £2,261,000 to the Ministry of Defence for meteorological services (this is shown in the Estimate as a transfer of £4,863,000 offset by an agreed correction of £2,602,000); (v) a claim on the reserve of £22,000,000 administration costs in respect of early release/early retirement schemes; (vi) a transfer of £5,605,000 from Department for International Development for the Montreal Protocol Fund; (vii) a transfer of £359,000 administration costs from the Cabinet Office for legal services provided by the Parliamentary Counsel's Office; (viii) a take up of £250,000 from HM Treasury for the 'Start Here' project; (ix) a take up of £86,000 from HM Treasury for the Energy Efficiency Programme (£100,000 administration costs and -£14,000 programme); (x) a transfer of £37,820,000 from non-budget for the British Waterways Board cost of capital.

The change in the capital element of the DEL arises from: (i) a transfer of £17,395,000 to HM Treasury in respect of the 2006-07 overspend; (ii) a drawdown of £142,000 End Year Flexibility for Invest to Save Budget projects; (iii) a drawdown of £6,000 End Year Flexibility for capital grants Invest to Save Budget projects.

The change in the administration budget element of the DEL not explained above is due to a transfer of £90,000,000 from programme to administration, £80,000,000 in respect of professional services and £10,000,000 in respect of the outsourced IT contract.

Departmental Expenditure (Forestry Commission)

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Joan Ruddock): Subject to Parliamentary approval of any necessary Supplementary Estimate, the Forestry Commission's DEL will be increased by £10,104,000 from £82,288,000 to £92,392,000. Within the DEL change, the impact on resources and capital are as set out in the following table:

Total	10,104	—	90,439	1,953	92,392

[1] The total of 'Administration budget' and 'Near-cash in Resource DEL' figures may well be greater than total resource DEL, due to the definitions overlapping.
[2] Capital DEL includes items treated as resource in Estimates and accounts but which are treated as Capital DEL in budgets.
[3] Depreciation, which forms part of resource DEL, is excluded from total DEL since capital DEL includes capital spending and to include depreciation of those assets would lead to double counting.

The change in the resource element of the DEL arises from:

a. A transfer of £7,994,000 from Department of Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, to allow the Forestry Commission to administer the Farm Woodland Premium scheme.

b. The take up of £3,610,000 end of year flexibility to meet expenditure on payment of private woodland grants, costs associated with efficiency initiatives and increased forecasts on both cost of capital and depreciation charges.

c. A transfer from resource to capital DEL of £1,800,000.

The change in the capital element of the DEL arises from:

a. A transfer from resource DEL of £1,800,000 to support capital investment of e-business systems.

Municipal Waste Policy

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Joan Ruddock): Household waste recycling has quadrupled in the last 10 years and waste is growing much less quickly than the economy. Business has also been increasing its effort to reduce the amount of packaging it puts around the products that we buy. Last month we announced proposals for increased targets for recovery and recycling of packaging for 2008-12. In 2012 we now hope overall to see producers recycling and recovering 66 per cent. of all paper and 65 per cent. of all glass packaging.

But we need to do more. Methane emissions from biodegradable waste in landfill count for about 3 per cent. of UK greenhouse gas emissions. We still lag behind much of mainland Europe in recycling and we will face EU fines if we exceed landfill limits.

In May, we announced a revised Waste Strategy for England. It set out new ways for us all to reduce, reuse and recycle our waste for the sake of the environment. Incentives appeared as part of that strategy and we consulted on possible schemes to help local authorities influence residents' behaviour at a local level. These schemes were similar to those that had been successful in both Europe and in North America. The UK is currently the only EU15 country that prevents authorities from trialling or putting in place these type of incentives schemes. The Local Government Association and local authorities from across the political spectrum have called for powers to introduce similar schemes.

Following on from the consultation, we announced in the Climate Change Bill Command Paper that we would provide in the Bill a power for a small number of local authorities to pilot incentives for household waste minimisation and recycling. I am today announcing the detail of these proposals, which for the first time will mean that authorities will be able both positively to reward those who recycle and charge those who do not.

A maximum of five local authorities will be granted permission to pilot the schemes. Councils will be able to come forward with schemes to fit local circumstances but they will have to be approved by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, and will need to be consistent with the framework set out in legislation. This approach will allow us to monitor the impacts of the pilots and report back to Parliament before a decision is made whether to roll them out more widely. Parliament would have a say in any final decision.

The framework covers a range of issues. First of all, since we are keen to avoid placing additional burdens on local residents, it says that if the authority collects any revenue through a scheme this must be returned to residents so residents as a whole will not be paying more. To further reduce the burden on both the public and local authorities, we are also enabling authorities to pay back rebates, and collect any payments, through Council Tax, should they wish to do so.

We have also built in further simple checks and balances to help ensure the right level of public protection. These are not about restricting local authorities' behaviour, as we continue to believe that they are in the best position to understand what is right for their area. Instead they are about helping the public to understand better what they might expect to see in a pilot scheme regardless of where they are in the country. For example, pilots could only be introduced where there was a good kerbside recycling service in place, and we ask that authorities take account in their plans of the needs of, or impacts on, potentially disadvantaged groups - for example young families. We also think that it is sensible for pilot authorities to review their policies for tackling flytipping, and to have a flytipping prevention strategy in place. Evidence from other countries where financial incentives schemes operate suggests that an increase in fly tipping is not an automatic consequence of introducing them, but having a strategy in place is good common sense. Government intend to retain a reserved power to create a cap in the future on the level of incentive, should this be necessary. We consider that this power provides a further protection for households.

Climate Change means that each of us needs to look at what we currently do and think hard about what more we could do both inside and outside the home.

This includes working together to reduce the amount of waste we generate. Our plan for incentives for waste fits into this.

To support this work on guidance and pilots, the Government will be making £1.5 million available every year for the next three years.

Copies of the summary of consultation responses and impact assessment have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. The documents are also available on the website of the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs at: www.defra.gov.uk.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH OFFICE

General Affairs and External Relations Council

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Jim Murphy): The General Affairs and External Relations Council (GAERC) will be held on 19-20 November in Brussels. I will represent the UK at the Foreign Ministers discussions. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development will attend the Defence and Development Ministers' discussions.

The agenda items are as follows:

FOREIGN MINISTERS

General Affairs

Preparation of the European Council on 13-14 December

The Council is expected to discuss the draft annotated agenda for the European Council in December on 13-14 December. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister explained to Parliament on 22 October the priority for the EU now must be the global challenges we face: employment, prosperity, competitiveness, climate change, and security. The Government look forward to the European Council addressing these issues when they meet next month.

Maritime Policy

The Commission is expected to brief the Council on maritime policy. The Government consider it important to maintain and promote the competitiveness of the EU maritime sector as part of the Lisbon Agenda.

Commission Legislative Work Programme 2008

The Council is expected to discuss the Commission Legislative Work Programme 2008, which the Government welcome, given its focus on delivering results, better regulation, tackling climate change, and promoting jobs and growth.

External Relations

Preparation of the EU Summits with China and India

The Council is expected to discuss preparation for the EU Summits with China and India on 28 and 30 November respectively. The Government want the Joint Statements for the Summits to cover climate security, including a commitment to work towards a low carbon future and a successful outcome at the UN climate change Conference in Bali, 3-14 December 2007. The Government will also want the Summits to discuss Burma and to encourage all neighbours to bring their influence to bear on contributing towards a democratic and stable Burma.

Preparation of the EU Summit with Africa

The Council is expected to discuss preparation for the EU Summit with Africa on 8 December including the endorsement of the EU Africa Joint Strategy and the Action Plan, which the Government support, and discussion of governance and human rights issues at the Summit. The Government will argue for a substantive discussion of these issues, including the situation in Zimbabwe.

Pakistan

The Council is expected to discuss the State of Emergency in Pakistan. The Government believe it is important the EU maintains pressure on President Musharraf to restore the Constitution, as set out in the EU Declaration of 6 November.

Middle East

The Council is expected to discuss an Action Plan outlining ways the EU can provide further practical support to the Middle East Peace Process, which the Government welcome. The Council is expected to adopt Conclusions highlighting support for the Annapolis meeting in late November.

The Council is expected to discuss Lebanon in light of political tensions surrounding the forthcoming Presidential elections.

Iran

High Representative for the Common Foreign and Security Policy, Javier Solana, is expected to brief the Council on his contacts with the Iranian authorities, and his report to E3+3 Ministers (Germany, France, UK, China, Russia and the US), which we expect him to deliver before the GAERC. Ministers are expected to reaffirm the commitment they made at the October GAERC to consider, after recommendations from Working Groups, the further steps the EU can take to support the agreed twin track international approach to the Iranian nuclear issue. The Government believe it is crucial that Iran complies with its international obligations and the twin track approach is the best way to achieve this goal.

Iraq

The Council is expected to discuss EU engagement with Iraq. The Government welcome discussion of the EU's financial, technical and political support towards a secure and stable Iraq. It also welcomes Foreign Minister Zebari's invitation to the Council and the opportunity this presents for the EU to step up its engagement.

Western Balkans

Ambassador Wolfgang Ischinger is expected to brief the Council on progress in talks between the Troika (EU, Russia and US) and Belgrade and Pristina to secure a negotiated settlement on the status of Kosovo. The Council is likely to adopt Conclusions reaffirming its support for ongoing efforts by the Troika to reach agreement on a status settlement in Kosovo and reiterating its support for High Representative Miroslav Lajcak in advancing key reforms in Bosnia. The Government fully support the efforts by the Troika to find agreement, but will emphasise the importance of the EU being prepared to act in the event agreement is not possible by December 10.

Georgia

The Council is expected to discuss recent events in Georgia. The Government welcome this discussion, given the recent developments, including the declaration of a State of Emergency by President Saakashvili in Georgia.

JOINT SESSION OF FOREIGN MINISTERS AND DEFENCE MINISTERS

European Security and Defence Policy Conclusions

The Council is expected to adopt Conclusions under the European Security and Defence Policy (ESDP) on current operations and missions, capability development including the European Defence Agency, Human Rights Issues and cooperation between the EU and the African Union in Strengthening African Capabilities.

Chad/Sudan-Darfur

The Council is expected to discuss the upcoming EU mission to Chad / Central African Republic, including Force Generation for the mission. The Council is also expected to discuss the security situation in Sudan/ Darfur, drawing on the ESDP Council Conclusions reaffirming the EU's support for ongoing efforts by the UN and African Union to resolve the conflict in Darfur and welcoming the forthcoming deployment of UN AMID, the UN/African Union Hybrid Mission in Darfur. The Government welcome the Conclusions, strongly supporting the need for a comprehensive and regional approach.

DEFENCE MINISTERS

European Defence Agency

The Head of the European Defence Agency (EDA), Alexander Weis, will brief the Council on the Agency's activities in 2007, before discussing the Agency's agenda in 2008.

The EDA Steering Board also meets on 19 November and is expected to agree the Agency's 2008 Work Programme. Ministers will also discuss the European Defence Research and Technology Strategy Framework and the Agency's benchmarks.

Operation EUFOR ALTHEA (Bosnia-Herzegovina)

The political situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina (BiH) has deteriorated over the last year, leading the EU to postpone signature of BiH's Stabilisation and Association Agreement (the first of many steps towards EU membership) in October 2007, following the collapse of police reform talks. The Government believe the EU and the international community should continue to encourage leaders in Bosnia to exercise restraint and to continue to engage in dialogue with each other and with the High Representative.

The Council is expected to discuss EUFOR Althea, the EU military peacekeeping operation in Bosnia-Herzegovina, in light of these recent political developments. The Government support EUFOR remaining at current levels during this period of uncertainty.

Military Capabilities

The Council will be briefed on the Headline Goal Progress Catalogue. This represents the finalisation of four years' of work from first instigation of the Headline Goal 2010 through the production of the Requirements Catalogue in 2005, the bidding stage in 2006 and finally the complex analysis of the shortfalls and risks that has been undertaken by the EU Military Staff and Headline-Goal Task Force managed by successive Presidencies. The Government want EU Member States to focus on how to prioritise these shortfalls and decide where to invest resources. We will call for further consultation and cooperation with NATO and for work on improving the EU's Intra-Theatre Transport capability.

The High Representative for the Common Foreign and Security Policy, Javier Solana, will present a paper identifying possible areas of improving EU Military Staff in early planning capability.

JOINT SESSION OF DEVELOPMENT AND DEFENCE MINISTERS

Development and Security

The Council will adopt Conclusions on Development and Security in four areas: Strategic Planning, Security Sector Reform, the EU-Africa partnership on Security and Development and Humanitarian Aid. The Government support the ongoing process in the EU to reinforce the Security-Development nexus and will focus on ensuring delivery of an implementation plan and call for follow up during successive Presidencies.

DEVELOPMENT MINISTERS

Orientation debate on the effectiveness of EU external action

The Council is expected to focus on the Africa-EU Strategic Partnership and action plans in advance of the EU Africa Summit on 8 December. Ministers will discuss the consequences and impacts of the strategy on EU external action, on the basis of a Presidency paper. The Government will push for agreement of the strategy and action plans and continues to push for action on Millennium Development Goals, climate change and peace and security. We expect Member States to be supportive of the strategic partnership and its goals, and to commit to implementation of the strategy.

Towards an EU response to situations of fragility

The Council will adopt Conclusions on the development of an EU policy and improved practices on the situation of Fragile States. The EU's response to fragile situations is critical as fragile states pose a great challenge, both in terms of the achievement of the Millennium Development Goals and in terms of global and regional security. The Government support the implementation of the measures proposed in the Commission's communication to increase coordination and coherence.

Policy coherence for development

The Council is expected to adopt Conclusions on policy coherence for development, including on climate change and migration. The discussion is expected to focus on the launch of the EU's first two-yearly report, reporting on the extent to which EU Member States have fulfilled their commitments to integrate development concerns within broader policymaking and highlighting key outstanding issues for the next reporting period.

Economic Partnership Agreements (EPAs)

The Council will discuss the Commission's Communication on Economic Partnership Agreements. The core of the Commission's strategy is to agree goods-only agreements this year ahead of the deadline on the 1 January before returning to services and other trade related areas in the future. The Government want to ensure that EPAs deliver on their development potential. The Government will also want to make clear that the African Caribbean and Pacific countries should not be bound to taking commitments on non-goods issues. It is their choice to negotiate on those elements.

Advancing Agriculture in Africa

The Council is expected to discuss the Advancing African Agriculture Strategy proposal for continental and regional-level cooperation on agricultural development in Africa, which the Government support. A better aligned and coherent EU response will help Africa to achieve its goal of agricultural-led growth, a more predictable response to dealing with hunger, and be better equipped to respond to the challenges presented by climate change.

Partnership with Cape Verde

The Council is expected to discuss a Partnership between the EU and the Republic of Cape Verde, a small Portuguese speaking island off the coast of West Africa. In line with the Cotonou Agreement this anticipates that Cape Verde will become a partner in increased police and judicial cooperation with Europe.

AOB: Ratification on the Cotonou Partnership Agreement

EU Member States need to ratify the revised EU's Partnership Agreement with African, Caribbean and Pacific (ACP) States (known as the 'Cotonou Agreement') and the 10th European Development Fund (EDF), by the end of 2007 in order for both to come into effect. Member States who have not already done so will be encouraged to conclude their ratification processes as soon as possible. The Government completed their ratification process in September.

Departmental Expenditure

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Meg Munn): Subject to Parliamentary approval of any necessary Supplementary Estimate, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office Departmental Expenditure Limit (DEL) will be increased by £48,122,000 from £1,840,333,000 to £1,888,455,000. The administration budget will be increased by £14,000 from £870,046,000 to £870,060,000. Within the DEL change, the impact on resources and capital are as set out in the following table:

£000	Change		New DEL

*The total of 'Administration budget' and 'Near-cash in Resource DEL' figures may well be greater than total resource DEL, due to the definitions overlapping.
Capital DEL includes items treated as resource in Estimates and accounts but which are treated as Capital DEL in budgets.
Depreciation, which forms part of resource DEL, is excluded from the total DEL since capital DEL includes capital spending and to include depreciation of those assets would lead to double counting.

The change in the resource element of the DEL arises from:

Request for Resources 1

Administration

I. £14,000 transfer of Administration Budget from Cabinet Office in respect of the Privy Council Office.

Programme

I. Take up of £22,000,000 other current End Year Flexibility for departmental restructuring.

II. Transfer of £7,000,000 other current expenditure to Home Office for the Border and Immigration Office.

III. Transfer of £5,300,000 Programme expenditure to the Security and Intelligence Agencies to cover expansion and capability.

IV. A £3,407,000 claim on the DEL Reserve of in respect of Emergency Disaster Relief.

Neutral Changes

I. Increased other current expenditure of £60,000,000, fully offset by income, for Consular and Visa Work.

II. Increased other current expenditure of £2,830,000, fully offset by income, in respect of anti-narcotics work.

Capital

I. Take up of £35,000,000 End Year Flexibility in respect of the FCO estate.

Request for Resources 2

Programme

II. Transfer of £3,000,000 from DFID in respect of Conflict Prevention operations in Afghanistan.

II. Transfer of £3,000,000 Programme expenditure to Security and Intelligence Agencies to cover expansion and capability.

HEALTH

Health Service Provision

The Secretary of State for Health (Alan Johnson): The Independent Sector is playing an important and increasing role within the NHS, providing high quality treatment and choice for patients, and innovation, dynamism and contestability for existing National Health Service providers. Alongside the hard work of staff in every organisation, the use of the independent sector is an integral part of our success in delivering dramatic falls in waiting times for patients.

That is why we have taken a number of measures to make better use of the independent sector:

In the first wave of the independent sector treatment centre (ISTC)programme we established 23 fixed site ISTCs, a mobile ophthalmology service, a mobile MRI scanning service, a chlamydia screening service and six walk-in centres. This investment worth over £1.4 billion has provided nearly 800,000 elective procedures, diagnostic assessments and episodes of primary care to NHS patients and is helping to reduce waiting times in those areas. I am today providing further information on each first wave scheme, including the contract value, volume of activity, case mix by volume and utilisation rates, and in future this data will be published annually.

There has been rapid growth in patients choosing to be referred to the 129 independent sector hospitals currently registered under the Extended Choice scheme. The value of activity has doubled in the last month alone. From April 2008, all patients referred for an elective procedure will be able to choose to go to any hospital in England which meets NHS standards and price. This already applies for orthopaedics and from December will cover general surgery, gynaecology and cardiology.

We are procuring additional GP services through the Fairness in Primary Care initiative from a range of providers including the independent sector, and as announced last month we will be inviting bidders for further primary care contracts as we roll out new GP-led health centres and extra GP surgeries in deprived areas. In addition, we are offering primary care trusts the opportunity to use independent sector expertise in developing their commissioning function.

As I said to the Health Select Committee in July, independent sector procurement will have to meet the local needs of patients and offer sound value for money for taxpayers. Where it meets these requirements we will increase the role of the independent sector in the provision of NHS services.

The Department has therefore undertaken a thorough revalidation of all the schemes currently being procured nationally through the ISTC programme to ensure they meet these objectives.

The Director General of the Commercial Directorate has advised that I proceed with the procurement of the following schemes:

PET CT North Diagnostics (additional CT scans);

PET CT South Diagnostics (additional CT scans);

Renal (provision of dialysis treatment);

Hampshire and Isle of Wight Electives (Southampton element);

Greater Manchester (B) Clinical Assessment and Treatment Services;

Avon, Gloucestershire and Wiltshire Electives;

Essex Electives;

Hertfordshire Electives;

Greater Manchester (A) Clinical Assessment and Treatment Services; and London North Electives.

I am pleased to announce that three of these: PET-CT North, PET-CT South and the Renal scheme have been approved to move to financial close. The Department will conclude decisions on the remaining schemes no later than the end of March 2008.

However the director general has concluded that the following schemes should not proceed as they were unlikely to provide acceptable value for money as the local NHS has successfully improved capacity to meet patients' needs. These are:

North East Yorkshire and North Lincolnshire Referral Assessment Diagnostics and Treatment Service;

North East Diagnostics;

South East Diagnostics;

Norfolk, Suffolk and Cambridge Electives;

Cumbria and Lancashire Clinical Assessment and Treatment Service; and Hampshire and Isle of Wight Electives (Lymington element).

In addition, the Director General has advised that the contract with Care UK for the provision of diagnostic services in the West Midlands should be terminated because of an unacceptably low rate of use (5 per cent. utilisation to date), and a very low prospect of the utilisation increasing which represents poor value for money to the taxpayer. In short, a significant increase in productivity by local NHS providers has substantially reduced the need for the capacity provided by this scheme with waiting times for most diagnostics reduced from more than one year to currently three weeks on average.

The reduction in the overall size of the procurement does not represent a change in policy. As I have stated before, we will continue to use the independent sector. However, as I said to the Health Select Committee, we will now move towards greater local procurement of services. This will enable primary care trusts to take procurement decisions quickly on behalf of their patients rather than waiting for a prolonged process run from Whitehall. We believe this will be a more effective route for increasing the quality of the role which the independent sector is able to provide in the NHS.

To support this move I am announcing today the establishment of an Independent Sector Procurement Forum as a means for Independent and Third Sector providers to advise the Department on policies and practices related to local procurement of clinical services in order to ensure a level playing field.

The forum will draw on a range of expertise and experience, including Ivan Bradbury of In Health Netcare and Sir Ian Carruthers of the South West Strategic Health Authority.

The forum will be advisory and act as a channel for the market to communicate and advise the Department on PCT procurement policies and practices.

We remain committed to choice, to empower patients and drive improvements in the quality of care. For choice to be truly effective, and for all providers to be able to compete fairly, it is essential that all patients are aware that they can now choose the hospital they are referred to. In the run up to the start of free choice, we will raise public awareness of choice through, for example, NHS Choices and other means, as well as encouraging local providers to inform patients about the local choices available to them, and publishing a Code of Promotion to help guide them in this.

To ensure fairness we will also, publish clear competition principles and simple rules for commissioners and providers to apply consistently for all those that provide services on behalf of the NHS, including social enterprise and third sector organisations as well as the independent sector; establish a competition panel to provide independent advice on competition issues to SHAs, which they would be excepted to follow working closely with their PCTs. The panel will only consider issues where action to resolve issues have been exhausted; and seek to open up membership of the Clinical Negligence Scheme for Trusts (CNST) to many non-NHS providers of NHS care.

Our approach to the Independent Sector is pragmatic not ideological. Where independent sector providers offer good value for money, innovation, and high quality patient care, we will continue to bring them in to work as part of the family of NHS providers.

Departmental Expenditure (Food Standards Agency)

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Dawn Primarolo): Subject to the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the Food Standards Agency's element of the Departmental Expenditure Limit (DEL) will be increased by £9,800,000 from £144,539,000 to £154,339,000 and the Administration Cost Limit will be increased by £4,100,000 from £52,415,000 to £56,515,000. The net cash requirement will also increase by £18,800,000 from £141,731,000 to £160,531,000 as a result of the £9,800,000 change in net total resources and additional £9,000,000 cash required to fund an expected decrease in creditors. The impact on resource and capital are set out in the following table.

		New DEL
	Change	Voted	Non-Voted	Total
Food Standards Agency	£ million	£ million	£ million	£ million
Resources	8.500	152.392	0	152.392
Capital	1.300	1.947	0	1.947
Total Food Standards Agency DEL	9.800	154.339	0	154.339
Depreciation*	0	-2.004	0	-2.004
Total Food Standards Agency spending (after adjustment)	9.800	152.335	0	152.335

* Depreciation, which forms part of resource DEL, is excluded from the total DEL since capital DEL includes capital spending and to include depreciation of those assets would lead to double counting.

The increase in net total resources and capital is by a take up of End Year Flexibility (EYF) of £9,800,000. Of this £4,100,000 is an increase in near cash administration costs, which will be used to fund restructuring of the Food Standards Agency's headquarters operations and related accommodation and support services costs. Near cash programme costs increase by £4,400,000 to assist with the restructuring of the Meat Hygiene Service. The balance of £1,300,000 is an increase in capital and will be used to fund an increased investment in IT hardware and infrastructure. All of these measures will help to deliver the efficiency savings required as part of the CSR settlement.

As a result of the change to net total resources, capital and the additional £9,000,000 cash required to fund the decrease in creditors, the net cash requirement will increase by £18,800,000.

RFR1

Following the machinery of government changes a transfer of £19,932,000 from the BERR, a net receipt transfer of £456,700,000 from the DCSF.

A technical movement of £281,970,000 from non-voted capital DEL to offset original receipt for Science, Research Innovation Fund, included as part of the DCSF MOG transfers.

RFR2

RfR2

Following the machinery of government changes a transfer of £8,500,000 from the BERR.

EU Education Council

The Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education (Bill Rammell): Lord Triesman will attend the Education Council on 15 November, representing both DIUS and DCSF interests. The agenda items are as follows:

Education

Ministers are expected to reach political agreement on the proposed European Qualifications Framework, following amendments agreed with the European Parliament. These amendments are in line with the General Approach which was agreed at a previous Council.

Ministers will be asked to adopt Conclusions on improving the quality of teacher education. These are aimed at improving both teacher training and the qualifications required by teachers, which are not formalised in many European countries. The UK is content with the text.

Ministers are expected to adopt Resolutions on "New skills for new jobs" and on "Education and training as a key driver of the Lisbon Strategy". These emphasise the importance of skills in the knowledge economy, and the role of education and training in achieving the Lisbon goals. The education and skills contribution to the Lisbon Agenda will be further discussed at an informal ministerial lunch.

It is expected that a General Approach will be agreed on the extension of the Erasmus Mundus Higher Education programme from 2009-2014. The UK supports this text. There will be an exchange of views on promoting the mobility of students, in particular regarding support; for students from less favourable socio-economic backgrounds.

There will also be an exchange of views on an Action Plan to promote multilingualism, and on a Resolution on modernising universities for Europe's global competitiveness. This Resolution is to be finalised at the Competitiveness Council on 22-23 November.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Departmental Expenditure (DFID)

The Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Douglas Alexander): As a consequence of budgetary transfers associated with the Winter Supplementary Estimates, the Department for International Development total departmental expenditure limit will be reduced by £4,995,000 from £5,259,352,000 to £5,254,357,000. Within the total DEL change, the impact on Resource and Capital is set out in the following table:

A Transfer to Department for Culture, Media and Sport for £1,000,000 in relation to the London 2012 International Sport Development Initiative.

A Transfer to Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs of £5,000 which relates to a shortfall from a previous transfer made relating to Montreal Protocol.

A reduction of £73,000,000 arising from a reclassification of debt relief payments from current grants to capital grants.

The net change in the Capital element of DEL arises from:

Additions

An increase of £73,000,000 arising from a reclassification of debt relief payments from current grants to capital grants.

JUSTICE

Criminal Justice Strategic Plan

The Secretary of State for Justice and Lord Chancellor (Mr. Jack Straw): The Government have today laid before Parliament "Working Together to Cut Crime and Deliver Justice: A Strategic Plan for Criminal Justice 2008-11"(Cm 7247). This plan sets out how we will deliver the new Justice for All Public Service Agreement targets for the Criminal Justice System to improve efficiency and effectiveness in bringing offences to justice, especially serious offences; increase public confidence and victim and witness satisfaction; increase recovery of criminal assets and improve enforcement of the orders of the court.

The strategic plan sets out a new approach to the way in which the criminal justice agencies—police, prosecution, courts, probation, prison and youth justice services—will work together to improve efficiency and effectiveness in bringing offences to justice by giving Local Criminal Justice Boards greater flexibility to tailor their work to local priorities. The Plan also sets out how the Criminal Justice System will support the Government's wider drive to make communities safer through reducing crime and re-offending, as detailed in the Crime Strategy: Cutting Crime: A New Partnership 2008-11, published on 19 July.

By working together more closely, staff in the Criminal Justice System have already successfully brought more offences to justice, improved services to victims and witnesses and built strong partnerships sat national and local level to drive up performance, supported by modern technology.

This plan builds on that success and sets out our commitment to a Criminal Justice System which:

is effective in bringing offences to justice engages the public and inspires confidence puts the needs of victims at its heart; and has simple and efficient processes.

While we have made great strides in tackling volume crime, there is more to do to tackle some of the most serious crimes, such as sexual and violent crime and support the victims of these crimes. At the other end of the scale, we need to intervene earlier and more effectively with young people at risk, both victims and offenders. We need to continue our drive to tackle some of the most intractable problems - mental health, substance misuse and social exclusion - which underlie many crimes.

We recognise that it is crucial to engage the public more closely in the work of the Criminal Justice System. We need to bring the Criminal Justice System closer to the people it serves so that we inform them, consult them and tell them how we are responding to their views. Local Criminal Justice Boards, working with local communities and Crime and Disorder Reduction Partnerships will have a key role in achieving this. More needs to be done to ensure that the Criminal Justice System provides a service which is fair and effective for all sections of the community.

We will go further in improving the efficiency of every part of the system making better use of the technology that is now in place, and give local areas title freedom to innovate and drive locally-tailored programmes of change.

The programmes of work we set out in this plan will support this local approach. We are designing a blueprint for local leadership to enable Local Criminal Justice Boards to implement a co-ordinated programme of reform which is shared by all the criminal justice agencies and engage effectively with local communities and local partners to tackle local priorities and reduce crime and re-offending.

We have set ourselves a challenging target on asset recovery sending a strong signal that crime does not pay. Offenders will be held to account for their actions and offered more opportunities to make amends to their victims and society. We will ensure that standards of service to victims and witnesses are embedded throughout the Criminal Justice System and that we respond to the needs of all victims, particularly the victims of the most serious crimes.

We will continue to drive improvements across the whole criminal justice process. But we will do so in a different way. At a national level we will provide the framework and support, but improvements will be driven at local level, informed by local priorities. We will measure and respond to the views of local people about their local services. We will work in partnership with local community and voluntary organisations. We will build on what works to make a sustainable difference to reducing crime and re-offending in communities.

Winter Supplementary Estimate (Ministry of Justice)

The Secretary of State for Justice and Lord Chancellor (Mr. Jack Straw): Subject to Parliamentary approval of any necessary Supplementary Estimate, the Ministry of Justice (MoJ), Northern Ireland Court Service and The National Archives Total Departmental Expenditure Limit (DEL) will be increased as follows:

Total DEL for Ministry of Justice (RfRl, 2 & 3) will be increased by £5,843,241,000 from £3,784,762,000 to £9,628,003,000 and the administration budget will be increased by £189,180,000 from £523,536,000 to £712,716,000.

Total DEL for the Northern Ireland Court Service (NICS) will be reduced by (£1,749,000) from £132,319,000 to £130,570,000 and there is no change in administration budget.

Total DEL for The National Archives (TNA) will be increased by £3,379,000 from £44,161,000 to £47,540,000 and the administration budget will be reduced by (£43,711,000) due to a reclassification from administration to programme budget.

Within the Total DEL change for Ministry of Justice (RfRl, 2 & 3), the impact on resources and capital are as set out in the following table:

Prime Minister's Delivery Unit (PMDU) transfer to HM Treasury (HMT) reduces RDEL and Net Cash Requirement in the Estimate by £4,028,000.

Budget cover transfers outwards

A budget transfer of cover to 14 Government Departments to cover the costs of the Office of the Parliamentary Counsel (OPC) reduces RDEL and Net Cash Requirement in the Estimate by £8,389,000.

A Budget transfer to Department for Communities and Local Government (DCLG) for Government Offices reduces RDEL and Net Cash Requirement in the Estimate by £764,000.

A Budget transfer to the Home Office (HO) to cover administration costs reduces RDEL and Net Cash Requirement in the Estimate by £104,000.

A Budget transfer to Office of National Statistics (ONS) to provide Administration cover for development reduces RDEL and Net Cash Requirement in the Estimate by £164,000.

Transfers

A transfer from RDEL to CDEL for SCOPE programme funding and the property refurbishment in Emergency Planning College reduces RDEL by £4,150,000 of which: Administration expenditure by £450,000 and programme expenditure by £3,700,000. The Net Cash Requirement is not affected.

A transfer from non voted programme expenditure in RDEL to non voted CDEL CapacityBuilders (UK) Ltd, an Executive Non Departmental Public Body reduces RDEL by £50,000,, The Net Resource Requirement and Net Cash Requirement are unaffected.

Inward transfers amount to an increase of £21,721,000 as follows:

Machinery of Government transfers

The Lord President of the Council Office and the Leader of the House of Lords and the Leader and the Deputy Leader of the House of Commons, and the Offices of the Government Whips in the House of Commons and House of Lords transfer from the Privy Council Office increases RDEL by £4,553,000, including non cash by £47,000 and Net Cash Requirement in the Estimate by £4,546,000.

Drawdown on the Reserves

Drawdown from the Special CT Reserve in HM Treasury to provide funding for the BBC monitoring programme increases RDEL and Net Cash Requirement in the Estimate by £5,000,000.

Drawdown from the Reserve for VAT Reimbursement for BBC Children in Need increases RDEL and Net Cash Requirement in the Estimate by £299,000.

Drawdown for V Matched Funding for the Office of the Third Sector to cover grant expenditure increases RDEL and Net Cash Requirement in the Estimate by £3,301,000.

Drawdown from the Invest to Save Budget (ISB) for Office of the Third Sector for grant expenditure increases RDEL and Net Cash Requirement in the Estimate by £399,000.

Budget cover transfers

A transfer from the disbanded Deputy Prime Minister's Office (DPMO) covering funds transferred from Cabinet Office in the Main Estimate increases RDEL and Net Cash Requirement in the Estimate by £1,233,000.

A transfer from Security and Intelligence Agencies to fund the BBC monitoring programme increases RDEL and Net Cash Requirement by £3,647,000.

Take up of End Year Flexibility

Drawdown Resource EYF (DEL cover only) cover for CapacityBuilders (UK) Limited £3,289,000: this represents funds held by CapacityBuilders (UK) Ltd at 31 March 2007 and remaining unspent. This does not affect the Net Cash Requirement nor Net Resource Requirement.

Changes in Capital DEL (CDEL)

Changes result in a net increase of £30,062,000 as follows:

Machinery of Government transfers

The Lord President of the Council Office and the Leader of the House of Lords and the Leader and the Deputy Leader of the House of Commons, and the Offices of the Government Whips in the House of Commons and House of Lords transfer from the Privy Council Office (PCO) increases CDEL and Net Cash Requirement by £40,000.

Transfers

A transfer from RDEL to CDEL for SCOPE programme funding £3,700,000 and the property refurbishment in Emergency Planning College £450,000 increases CDEL by £4,150,000. Net Cash Requirement is not affected.

A transfer from non voted programme expenditure in RDEL to non voted CDEL for CapacityBuilders (UK) Ltd, an Executive Non Departmental Public Body increases CDEL by £50,000. The Net Cash Requirement is not affected.

Take up of End Year Flexibility (EYF)

Drawdown Capital DEL EYF to fund the SCOPE programme and other property projects across the Whitehall Estate increases CDEL and Net Cash Requirement by £25,822,000 of which: £22,143,000 to cover costs of the SCOPE programme and £3,679,000 for various property projects across the Whitehall Estate.

Departmental Expenditure (Charity Commission)

The Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office (Phil Hope): Plans to change the Charity Commission's Departmental Expenditure Limit (DEL) and administration budget for 2007-08.

Subject to Parliamentary approval of any necessary Supplementary Estimate, the Charity Commission total DEL will be increased by £1,001,000 from £30,992,000 to £31,993,000. Within the total DEL change, the impact on resources and capital is as set out in the following table:

	Voted	Non-Voted	Voted	Non-Voted	Total
Resource DEL	1,500	0	31,743	0	31,743

Total DEL	1,001	0	31,993	0	31,993

[1]The total of 'Administration Budget' and 'Near-cash in Resource DEL' figures may well be greater than total resource DEL, due to the definitions overlapping.
[2]Capital DEL includes items treated as resource in Estimates and accounts but which are treated as Capital DEL in budgets.
[3]Depreciation, which forms part of resource DEL, is excluded from the total DEL since capital DEL includes capital spending and to include depreciation of those assets would lead to double counting.

The change in the resource element of the DEL and in the administration budget arises from additional funding agreed in the 2007 Comprehensive Spending Review (CSR) Settlement as follows:

expenditure of £1,000,000 to review the links between terrorist financing and charities;

£500,000 to fund additional responsibilities following the passage of the Charities Act 2006.

The change in the administration budget also arises from additional funding in the 2007 CSR settlement as detailed above.

The change in the capital element of the DEL reflects a reduction of funding on capital spending of £499,000 following the 2007 Comprehensive Spending Review Settlement.

The Supplementary Estimate also details changes in operating appropriations in aid, fully offset by changes in spending and not impacting on the Commission's Departmental Expenditure Limit:

project funding of £450,000 by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office for the continuation of the International Outreach project; funding of £400,000 by the Department for Communities and Local Government for the creation of the Faith and Social Cohesion unit;

£250,000 additional accommodation charges funded by the sub-letting of a floor at the Commission's London office building.

Departmental Expenditure (National School of Government)

The Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office (Gillian Merron): Subject to Parliamentary approval of any necessary Supplementary Estimate, the National School of Government departmental expenditure limit (DEL) will be increased by £802,000 from £415,000 to £1,217,000 and the administration costs limit will be £1,217,000. Voted Capital will increase by £401,000 to £1,270,000. These figures reflect a take up of End Year Flexibility from 2006-07 and a transfer of £200,000 from Resource to Capital.

Within the DEL change, the impact of resources and Capital are as set out in the following table:

£'000	Change	Voted	Total

Total	1,203	1,987	1,987

*The total of the 'Administration Budget' and the 'Near cash in Resource DEL' figures may well be greater than the total resource DEL, due to definitions overlapping.
Capital DEL includes items treated as resources in Estimates and Accounts but which are treated as Capital DEL in Budgets.
Depreciation, which forms part of resource DEL, is excluded from the total DEL since capital DEL includes capital spending and to include depreciation of those assets would lead to double counting.

GOVERNMENT EQUALITIES OFFICE

Departmental Expenditure (Government Equalities Office)

The Leader of the House of Commons (Ms Harriet Harman): The Transfer of Functions (Equality) Order 2007 (No. 2914) confirms the establishment of the Government Equalities Office and details the functions that have transferred from the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government. The transfer of functions from the Department of Communities and Local Government came into force on 12 October 2007.

Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the Government Equalities Office Departmental Expenditure Limit will be set at £73,430,000 and the administration budget will be set at £3,885,000. The Departmental Expenditure Limit includes £46,500,000 resource and £7,000,000 capital funding for the Commission for Equality and Human Rights.

Within the Departmental Expenditure Limit, the impact on resource and capital is as set out in the following table:

	Departmental Expenditure Limit £000
	Voted	Non-voted	Total
Resource	33,296	33,538	66,834
Of which: [1]

Capital [2]	0	7,175	7,175
Depreciation [3]	0	-579	-579
Total	33,296	40,134	73,430

[1]The Total of 'administration budget' and 'near-cash' figures may be greater than total resource Departmental Expenditure Limit, due to the definitions overlapping.
[2]Capital Departmental Expenditure Limit includes items treated as resource in Estimates and accounts but which are treated as Capital Departmental Expenditure Limit in budgets.
[3]Depreciation, which forms part of resource Departmental Expenditure Limit, is excluded from the total Departmental Expenditure Limit since capital Departmental Expenditure Limit includes capital spending and to include depreciation of those assets would lead to double counting.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Departmental Expenditure (Northern Ireland Office)

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Shaun Woodward): Subject to Parliamentary approval the Northern Ireland Office (NIO) will be taking a 2007/08 Winter Supplementary Estimate. The effect this will have is to increase the NIO's DEL by £190,138,000 from £1,163,537,000 to £1,353,675,000.

Total	56,655	133,483	376,108	977,567	1,353,675

The change in total DEL of £190,138,000 relates primarily to the draw down of End Year Flexibility of £172,500,000 of which £69,500,000 is near cash resource and £103,000,000 is non-cash. There is an increase of £30,000,000 in respect of a change in the discount rate for police pensions; a resource budget transfer of £165,000 from the Cabinet Office; and a Machinery of Government change of £751,000 to transfer responsibility for the Criminal Injuries Compensation Appeals Panel to the Northern Ireland Court Service.

The cash draw down is in relation to the additional resource requirement for various business areas within the Department such as Political Inquiries, Public Prosecution Service, NIPS, YJA, Criminal Justice, Bloody Sunday Inquiry, PSNI, Probation Board and Policing Board. The non-cash element is required for Public Prosecution Service, Compensation Agency, Youth Justice Agency and PSNI.

The administration budget increases by £3,045,000 from £78,824,000 to £81,869,000 as a result of the take up of End Year Flexibility and the resource budget transfer from the Cabinet Office.

The reduction in capital DEL of £10,000 is the Machinery of Government transfer of responsibility for the Criminal Injuries Compensation Appeals Panel to the Northern Ireland Court Service.

PRIME MINISTER

European Union

The Prime Minister (Mr. Gordon Brown): I have appointed Sir Stephen Wall to write volume II of the Official History of the UK Accession to the European Union.

SCOTLAND

Departmental Expenditure (Scotland)

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Des Browne): Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimates, the Departmental Expenditure Limit (DEL) provision for the administration of the Scotland Office will be increased by £56,000 and the Scotland DEL will be increased by £786,601,000 from £26,270,808,000 to £27,057,409,000.

The administration of the Scotland Office DEL increase takes account of the following routine adjustment:

a transfer of £56,000 from the Scottish Executive

The Scotland DEL increase takes account of the following routine adjustments to the Scottish Executive provision:

the take-up of End Year Flexibility (EYF) by the Scottish Executive amounting to £655,000,000;

The DEL increase also includes the following changes, amounting to a net increase of £155,991,000. These are:

a transfer of £25,947,000 from the Department for Transport;

a classification change in respect of the funding of the Scottish WaterCost of Capital of £130,100,000; and a transfer of £56,000 to the Scotland Office.

The increases will be added to the planned total of public expenditure to fund spending commitments in the current financial year.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Departmental Expenditure (Attorney-General)

The Solicitor-General (Vera Baird): My right hon. Friend the Attorney-General has made the following written ministerial statement:

Subject to Parliamentary approval of the Winter Supplementary Estimate, the Attorney General's DEL will be increased by £39,479,000 from £717,497,000 to £756,976,000 and the Administration budget will be increased by £7,382,000 from £112,261,000 to £119,643,000.

Within the DEL change, the impact on resources and capital are as set out in the following table:

	Change		New DEL
	Voted	Non-Voted	Voted	Non-Voted	Total
Resource	37,988	-7,000	749,341		749,341
Of which:
Administration Budget	7,382		119,643		119,643
Near Cash in RDEL	37,426	-7,000	736,098	1,713	737,811
Capital	2,000		16,900		16,900
Depreciation[1]	-509		-9,265		-9,265
Total Del	39,479	-7,000	756,976	1,713	756,976

[1]Depreciation, which forms part of resource DEL, is excluded from the total DEL since capital DEL includes capital spending and to include depreciation of those assets would lead to double counting.

The Crown Prosecution Service's (CPS) element of the Attorney General's DEL will be increased by £14,815,000 from £631,537,000 to £646,352,000. The Administration budget will be reduced by £112,000 from £57,415,000 to £57,303,000.

The change in the CPS's DEL arises from:

The take up of £7,000,000 of the Departmental Unallocated Provision to support increased expenditure on the prosecution of criminal cases.

An increase due to a budgetary transfer of £1,291,000 programme from the Ministry of Justice to provide support to Local Criminal Justice Boards (LCJBs).

An increase of £539,000 programme DEL transferred from the Ministry of Justice to provide additional resources from Criminal Justice Information Technology (CUT) to fund the Case Progression Tool, 'Progress'.

An increase of £2,364,000 programme for ExiSSrl from CJIT to allow the electronic transfer of case data between the Police and CPS.

An increase of £1,834,000 programme from the Ministry of Justice to provide additional resources as agreed in the CJIT Delivery Plan to fund enhancements to the Witness Management System (WMS).

An increase of £7,300,000 programme due to the re-allocation of resource DEL budgetary cover from the Ministry of Justice to provide additional resources to help fund the Compass Case Management System IT programme.

An increase of £1,285,000 programme due to the re-allocation of resource DEL budgetary cover from the Ministry of Justice to provide the CPS Serious Organised Crime team with a secure case management system and access to the government secure network.

An agreed transfer of £218,000 programme expenditure from the Department for Constitutional Affairs to fund the North Liverpool Community Justice Centre.

A transfer of £96,000 from the Home Office to fund CPS costs of delivery of the Violent Crime Reduction Act 2007.

A decrease of £112,000 in administration resource due to the reallocation of resource DEL budgetary cover, within the Attorney General's resource DEL, from the Crown Prosecution Service to HM Procurator General & Treasury Solicitors. This is required to help fund the provision of administrative services to the Attorney General by the Attorney General's Office.

The Serious Fraud Office (SFO) element of the Attorney General's DEL will be increased by £17,145,000 from £37,669,000 to £54,814,000. The Administration budget will increase from £24,969 to £31,635.

The changes in the SFO's DEL arise from:

The take up of £2,000,000 Administration resource End Year Flexibility.

An increase of £13,649,000 from our two Block Buster Cases reserves. £4,670,000 to our Administration budget; £8,679,000 for our Programme budget and £300,000 for our Capital budget.

A decrease of £4,000 Administration resources due to the reallocation of resource DEL budgetary cover, within the Attorney General's resource DEL, from the Serious Fraud Office to HM Procurator General & Treasury Solicitors. This is required to help fund the provision of administrative services to the Attorney General by the Attorney General's Office.

A cash neutral change to our administration budget of £300,000 being both increase in costs and increase in revenue as a consequence of Expected Proceeds of Crime Income.

The take up of £1,700,000 Capital End Year Flexibility to meet the cost of additional spend.

The Revenue and Customs Prosecutions Office's (RCPO) element of the Attorney General's DEL will be reduced by £317,000 from £36,726,000 to £36,409,000. This reduction will occur within the Administration Budget which will be reduced from £18,253,000 to £17,936,000.

The change in RCPO's DEL arises from:

A decrease of £317,000 Administration resources due to the reallocation of resource DEL budgetary cover, within the Attorney General's resource DEL, from the Revenue and Customs Prosecutions Office to HM Procurator General & Treasury Solicitors. This is required to help fund the provision of administrative services to the Attorney General by the Attorney General's Office.

The HM Procurator General and Treasury Solicitor (TSol) element of the Attorney General's DEL will be increased by £836,000 from £16,221,000 to £17,057,000. This increase will occur within the Administration Budget which will increase from £11,624,000 to £ 12,769,000.

The change in TSol's DEL arises from:

Administration cost changes in respect of a reallocation of resource DEL budgetary cover, within the Attorney General's resource DEL, of £4,000 from the Serious Fraud Office (SFO), £317,000 from the Revenue and Customs Prosecutions Office (RCPO) and £112,000 from the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) to the Treasury Solicitors Department to meet the cost of policy support to the Attorney General provided by the Attorney General's Office (AGO).

The take up of £712,000 resource End Year Flexibility to meet the cost of policy support to the Attorney General provided by the Attorney General's Office (AGO).

An increase of £309,000 in depreciation costs.

TRANSPORT

Departmental Expenditure (Department for Transport)

The Secretary of State for Transport (Ruth Kelly): Subject to parliamentary approval of any necessary supplementary estimate, the Department for Transport departmental expenditure limit (DEL) for 2007-08 will be increased by £197,841,000 from £12,907,737,000 to £13,105,578,000 and the administration budget will be increased by £30,087,000 from £259,297,000 to £289,384,000.

Within the DEL change, the impact on resources and capital, are as set out in the following table:

	Change in DEL		New DEL

WALES

Departmental Expenditure (Wales Office)

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Peter Hain): The Welsh Assembly Government's Departmental Expenditure Limit will be increased by £29,750,000 from £13,789,740,000 to £13,819,490,000. The increase is a result of:

(a) Take-up of £30,000,000 EYF - Near Cash Less

(b) Transfers of £220,000 Non-cash and £30,000 Near Cash to the Wales Office

And includes:

(c) Capital to Resource switch of £48,500,000.

The increase in DEL will be offset by transfers from other Departments and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Provision for the Wales Office is increased by £476,000 as a result of

A transfer from the Parliamentary Counsel Office of £226,000 near-cash

A transfer from the Welsh Assembly Government of £220,000 non-cash

A transfer from the Welsh Assembly Government of £30,000 programme

Wales Office spending is contained within single Ministry of Justice Departmental Expenditure Limit and Administration Costs Limit.

Child Maintenance and Enforcement Commission

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Peter Hain): I am pleased to announce the appointment of Janet Paraskeva as the Chair Designate of the Child Maintenance and Enforcement Commission. Her appointment will take effect as from 19 November 2007. Janet Paraskeva brings extensive experience to this role from her time as Chief Executive of the Law Society, Director of the National Lottery Charities Board and as Chief Executive of the National Youth Agency. She is also currently the First Civil Service Commissioner.

Subject to the passage of the Child Maintenance and Other Payments Bill, the Child Maintenance and Enforcement Commission will have responsibility for the future Child Maintenance system. The Commission's key objective will be to get more money to more families, helping to lift more children out of poverty.

Disability Living Attendance Allowances

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. James Plaskitt): Disability Living Allowance (DLA) and Attendance Allowance (AA) are paid to people with extra needs arising from their disabilities. These benefits are administered by the Disability and Carers Service. Where people have reached state pension age and are receiving state pension or pension credit, normal practice is to combine the payment of AA or DLA with state pension and pension credit so that the customer receives one combined weekly payment of benefit. These combined payments are administered by The Pension Service.

The Department is responsible for administering more than 1.6 million such cases. It has recently been identified that over a period dating from 1996, there are just over 4,000 cases where our customers have been paid in error by both The Pension Service and the Disability and Carers Service. The total amount overpaid is estimated to be some £26 million. Steps have already been taken to prevent such duplicate payments occurring in the future.

It is clearly right that where duplicate payments are being made the position should be corrected. However, given that the customers involved are both elderly and disabled, I have decided not to seek recovery of past overpayments, some of which go back as far as 1996, in cases where the customer clearly did not know they were being overpaid.

I recognise that some people will need help in adjusting their finances to the reduced, albeit correct, level of benefit We believe that a very small number of the cases, around 50, involve people with a terminal illness and I judge it would not be appropriate to cause them and their families additional worry. In these cases, I propose to make ex-gratia payments to maintain the higher level of payment. Based on information held by the Department the estimated cost will be no more than £200,000 in a full year.

In all other cases I propose, at the same time as stopping the duplicate payment, to make in each case an ex-gratia payment of between £100 and £350, depending on the length of time they have been overpaid. Beyond that further ex-gratia payments will be considered on an individual basis in case of exceptional needs. The total cost of making the ex-gratia payments outlined above is estimated to be no more than £1.3 million.

Departmental Expenditure (Work and Pensions)

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Peter Hain): Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the Department for Work and Pensions Departmental Expenditure Limit will increase by £6,486,406 from £7,636,561,000 to £7,643,047,406 and the administration budget will increase by £17,880,000 from £5,798,484,000 to £5,816,364,000.

Within the Departmental Expenditure Limit change, the impact on resource and capital is as set out in the following table:

	Change			New Departmental Expenditure Limit
	Voted	Non-voted	Total	Voted	Non-voted	Total
Resource	53,139	-45,766	7,373	6,449,887	1,283,350	7,733,237
Of which:
Administration	17,880	0	17,880	5,710,554	105,810	5,816,364
Near-cash	53,139	-45,766	7,373	6,238,517	1,332,008	7,570,525
Capital	-887	0	-887	63,780	395	64,175
Depreciation[1]	0	0	0	-153,023	-1,342	-154,365
Total	52,252	-45,766	6,486	6,360,644	1,282,403	7,643,047

[1] Depreciation, which forms part of resource Departmental Expenditure Limit, is excluded from the total Departmental Expenditure Limit since the capital Departmental Expenditure Limit includes capital spending and to include depreciation of those assets would lead to double counting.

Resource Departmental Expenditure Limit

The change in the resource element of the Departmental Expenditure Limit arises from:

Request for Resources 3

i. A HM Treasury reclassification of grant in aid of £1,093,000 paid to the Pension Protection Fund from capital to resource (grants).

Request for Resources 5

ii. A draw down of £6,000,000 from the Financial Inclusion Fund in respect of the Growth Fund (administration).

iii. A transfer of £280,000 from the Cabinet Office in respect of the expansion of the Parliamentary Counsel Office (administration).

Capital Departmental Expenditure Limit

The change in the capital element of the Departmental Expenditure Limit arises from:

Request for Resources 2

iv. A draw down of £206,406 from the Invest to Save Budget in respect of funding for the Single Homelessness Enterprise project (£191,406) and the Aspire project (£15,000).

Request for Resources 3

v. A HM Treasury reclassification of grant in aid of £1,093,000 paid to the Pension Protection Fund from capital to resource.

Administration costs

The movement in the Administration Cost limit arises from the changes to the Resource Departmental Expenditure Limit as noted in items i to iii above, plus:

vi. A transfer from other current to administration of £11,600,000,000 previously drawn down from the Housing Benefit Reform Fund to support the Rent Service.

Movements in non-voted expenditure

The reduction in non-voted resource expenditure is due to a reduction in the cost of administering National Insurance Fund benefit payments. This reduction is offset by an increase in voted resource due to an equivalent reduction in income from the HM Revenue and Customs to meet the cost of administering National Insurance Fund benefit payments:

Request for Resources 2

vii. A reduction in non-voted resource expenditure of £23,571,000 offset by an increase in voted resource expenditure of £23,571,000.

Request for Resources 3

viii. A reduction in non-voted resource expenditure of £12,105,000 offset by an increase in voted resource expenditure of £12,105,000.

Request for Resources 5

ix. A reduction in non-voted resource expenditure of £10,090,000 offset by an increase in voted resource expenditure of £10,090,000.

Written Ministerial Statements

Monday 19 November 2007

Commission on Environmental Markets and Economic Performance

The Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform (Mr. John Hutton): My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for DEFRA, DIUS and I are publishing today the report to Government by the Commission on Environmental Markets and Economic Performance (CEMEP).

The CEMEP report describes how major economic opportunities are emerging from the growing imperative of climate change and how the UK can take a lead in seizing these opportunities and become the best place to do business.

The Government's response to the CEMEP will be published in 2008.

Local Government

The Minister for Local Government (John Healey): I have today published a summary of responses received in response to the Government's stakeholder consultation on proposals for future unitary structures in England, and placed a copy in the Libraries of both Houses.

On 27 March Ministers announced that of the 26 proposals received from authorities wishing to obtain unitary status, 16 proposals were judged to have at least a reasonable likelihood of achieving the outcomes specified by the criteria set out in our Invitation to Council. We issued a 12 week-consultation, "Proposals for Future Unitary Structures: Stakeholder Consultation", seeking views on the extent to which the 16 proposals, if implemented, would achieve the outcomes specified by the criteria in our invitation.

We are very encouraged by the very strong response to this consultation, which has provided us with a range of evidence and views that have helped to inform and clarify the Government's consideration of the proposals. I am also grateful to hon. Members for their continued and ongoing comments on unitary proposals in their areas.

On 25 July I announced to the House the nine unitary proposals that my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State, was minded to implement, having considered all the available relevant information including the responses received in response to the stakeholder consultation.

Those proposals included Bedford borough council's proposal for a unitary Bedford. I explained that implementing that proposal meant that we must consider the future local government structures for the remaining county area, and that we intended formally to invite all the other councils in Bedfordshire to propose a unitary solution that would meet our five criteria for that remaining area.

Today the Secretary of State has invited Bedfordshire county council, Mid-Bedfordshire district council, and South Bedfordshire district council to make a proposal for future unitary local government structures for that remaining area. This invitation, made under the Local Government and Public Involvement in Health Act 2007, provides that a proposal may be submitted by a single council or jointly by two or more councils, and that any proposal should be received by 17 December 2007.

We have also today issued guidance to those councils, to which they are required by the Act to have regard when responding to the invitation.

The guidance sets out the outcomes any proposal should seek to achieve and matters which the councils should take into account in formulating any proposal. These matters include Bedford borough council's unitary proposal which I told the House on 25 July we were minded to implement. At that time I also explained that we were asking that council to undertake further work and submit additional information on the financial viability of their proposal. On the basis of a preliminary assessment of the additional information and representations that we have now received from the council and others, the Secretary of State remains minded to implement Bedford borough council's proposal.

We are satisfied that the remaining area of Bedfordshire needs unitary local government to complement any unitary Bedford council. This invitation is an opportunity to propose the creation of a new unitary council which will promote that area's prosperity, empower its people and communities, and ensure the delivery of high quality local public services to all who live and work there.

I have also placed a copy of the invitation and guidance to the county and district councils of Bedfordshire in the Libraries of both Houses, and these documents can also be found on the website of the Department for Communities and Local Government at: http://www.communities.gov.uk//publications/localgovernment/unitarystructures

Carbon Emissions Reduction Target (2008-11)

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Hilary Benn): On 23 May 2007, Government published its consultation on the Carbon Emissions Reduction Target (CERT), previously referred to as EEC 3. In that consultation the Government proposed to impose the CERT mechanism to 2011 at around double the level of activity of the current EEC 2005-08. It proposed to extend its scope to include, in addition to energy efficiency measures, microgeneration and other measures for reducing the consumption of supplied energy. It proposed to introduce new approaches for innovation and flexibility and to maintain a focus on low-income consumers.

Following this consultation the Government have been taking account of the responses received, alongside further analysis, to finalise the framework for the CERT. Our intention remains to double the level of activity required by energy suppliers in order to deliver overall lifetime carbon dioxide savings of about 154 $MtCO_2$, equivalent to annual net savings of 4.2 $MtCO_2$ by 2010.

A CERT of this level will deliver significant energy saving benefits to householders, with about 8 million householders likely to benefit directly. The CERT will also offer new support for a wide range of innovation with particular incentive for microgeneration activity, potentially supporting about £200 million worth of activity.

We intend to announce further details and lay the relevant Statutory Instrument before Parliament shortly.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Justice and Home Affairs Council

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Meg Hillier): The Justice and Home Affairs (JHA) Council was held in Brussels on the 8-9 November 2007. My right hon. Friend, the Lord Chancellor and Secretary of State for Justice, my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Ministry of Justice (Bridget Prentice), the Solicitor General for Scotland (Frank Mulholland) and I attended on behalf of the United Kingdom. The following issues were discussed at the Council.

The Council opened with a lunch for Interior Ministers where the presidency reported on the work of the Future Group on home affairs following the meeting of Interior Ministers in Madeira on 28 and 29 October, including immigration; information-sharing (including SIS); internet access; counter-terrorism; and justice. The group had stressed the need to look at enhancing the operability of existing databases, rather than the creation of new ones. The Commission noted that a key issue for the Future Group was the desire for more integrated management of the EU's external borders and to see a need for an integrated EU returns policy. They also stressed the need for better coordination between Ministries of Justice and Home Affairs in relation to counter-terrorism.

The Council began with the mixed committee which included Norway, Iceland and Switzerland. Work will continue to find a compromise on the directive for returning illegally staying third country nationals.

The expansion of the Schengen area to the new member states was welcomed. The presidency emphasised the importance of Schengen and acknowledged the efforts that had been made by the new member states to meet the Schengen acquis and the efforts of the Portuguese team in driving forward SISOne4All. The formal decision on evaluation will be taken at the December Council after the European Parliament has voted.

The presidency noted that Schengen Information System (SIS) II remained the priority and SISone4All was not the end of the process. The Commission said they continued making good progress on the central SIS system. Most member states are now connected to the SIS II network and so can make use of the central testing facilities. By mid-January it should be possible to assess the legal, financial and technical detail of implementation in detail. Slovenia said that that SIS II would be a top priority for its presidency.

The presidency reported that a bidding process had been undertaken to ensure there would be no break in the service of the SIS Communication Network.

A general approach was reached on the Data Protection Framework Decision. The presidency emphasised the importance of data sharing and of protection of personal data and the need to bring this work to a close after two years of negotiations. The UK welcomed the text and called for swift resolution of the remaining minor issues while retaining its parliamentary scrutiny reserve.

The main agenda began with a discussion of interior issues. Progress was made on chapters 2 and 3 of the Europol Council decision on the collection and storage of data. The presidency indicated that they would take some or all of the outstanding issues on the Council decision to the December JHA Council. The Europol implementation plan was adopted to set out the steps and timescales for the introduction of Community Financing for Europol from January 2010.

Subject to parliamentary scrutiny reserves, a general approach was reached on the Prüm Implementing Agreement which will put into practice the Prüm arrangements for the exchange of data on fingerprints, DNA and vehicle registration contained in the original Council decision agreed in June. The presidency will now convene a technical group to consider the technical annex to the agreement.

The presidency also welcomed a general approach, subject to parliamentary scrutiny reserves (including the UK), on the Council decision on the Special Intervention Units in crisis situations. They will operate on a voluntary basis and will make financing the Atlas network easier. The "ATLAS network" is an informal cooperation structure between special intervention units in the European Union. This draft decision will be a positive step forward for many member states who do not possess a great deal of experience in such scenarios and will formalise the current practice whereby specialist UK police units endeavour to share best practice with police forces across Europe. The voluntary nature of the proposal means that while the impact on the UK will be minimal other member states with limited capacity to deal with crises may derive significant benefit from it.

The Commission presented their latest proposals on legal migration (two draft directives proposed in October). They set out the poor performance of the EU in attracting highly qualified workers in comparison to the US and Canada. The "blue card" directive on the conditions of entry and residence of highly skilled workers was introduced to improve this by reducing competition between member states. The Commission emphasised that this was not a quota system and that member states would make the decision on entry. The proposals were generally welcomed but some noted concerns. The presidency promised a longer discussion at the December Council.

In reporting the outcome of the EU-Western Balkans Ministerial Forum on Justice and Home Affairs in Brdo on 4 and 5 October, the presidency reported good progress on document security and border management from the Western Balkan countries. There was less optimism on police and judicial cooperation and organised crime and corruption. Slovenia announced that organised crime would be a priority under its presidency.

An EU-LAC (Latin, American and Caribbean) seminar will take place in May 2008 in Lima and will focus on migration. The Commission reminded the member states of the importance of close co-operation with countries with whom the EU had common cultural and language ties such as Latin America.

At the start of the second day Justice Ministers reached a political agreement on the mediation directive. The UK congratulated the presidency on its efforts regarding this important measure for citizens.

There followed a lengthy exchange of views on the draft framework decision on the mutual recognition of suspended sentences and alternative sanctions. The Justice Secretary and the Scottish Solicitor-General intervened to emphasise the need for proportionality and to make it clear that the issuing state had discretion not to transfer sentences to states that were unable to take on full responsibility for both supervision and enforcement, and to argue that the instrument should respect the rights of victims. The presidency concluded that there had been broad agreement to the compromise package and it was positive about a successful outcome in December.

Council conclusions on Cybercrime were adopted. The Commission outlined its intention to establish a "European cybercrime training platform" with the Police College (CEPOL) and Europol. It also wants to prepare in early 2008, with member states and the private sector, a European code of conduct for public-private cooperation. It also confirmed that its report on implementation of the framework decision on attacks against information systems was due in early 2008.

Council conclusions on the Trafficking of Human Beings were also adopted. Some member states called for further work on this. The Commission will produce a questionnaire dealing with the protection of victims and details of implementing measures in member states. It will then produce a manual to help member states evaluate their progress in the fight against trafficking.

The Council was closed with a working lunch for Justice Ministers who listened to a presentation and had a first exchange of views on the implications of the ruling of the European Court of Justice on ship source pollution in relation to Community competence in criminal law matters.

The next JHA Council will be held in Brussels on 6 and 7 December.

JUSTICE

Land Registry

The Minister of State, Ministry of Justice (Mr. Michael Wills): Land Registry will today launch a formal consultation exercise to seek views on proposals for a new order to add two new "triggers" for compulsory registration of title and provide for the effect on non-compliance with the duty to apply for registration in relation to the first of those triggers. Copies of the consultation document have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. Copies have also been placed in the Vote Office and Printed Paper Office. Copies are also available on the internet at:

http:/www.consultations.landregistry.gov.uk/inovem/consult.ti/system/listConsultations?type=0

Under the Land Registration Act 2002, when certain events affect an unregistered legal estate in land, the owner must apply to Land Registry for first registration of his title. Such events are often referred to as "triggers".

The purpose of the proposed order is to add to those events already listed in section 4 of the Land Registration Act 2002 the following events as triggers for compulsory registration:

the appointment of a new trustee of land held in trust where the land vests in the new trustee by deed or other instrument in writing or by a vesting order of the court and the partitioning of unregistered land held in trust amongst the beneficiaries of the trust.

The proposals are intended to help create a land register that is as comprehensive as possible and thus make transactions in land and property in England and Wales simpler and more efficient.

Subject to the outcome of the proposals, it is anticipated that the order would be made during 2008.

Robert Hamill Inquiry (Legal Costs)

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Shaun Woodward): On 1 April 2004 my right hon. Friend the Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy) announced the Government's intention to establish public inquiries into the deaths of Robert Hamill, Rosemary Nelson and Billy Wright, following reports by Mr. Justice Cory.

In his statement to the House that day my right hon. Friend said:

"We will, of course, take all reasonable steps to control costs in the inquiries that I have announced today, including capping legal costs where appropriate" 1 April 2004, Official Report, column 1757.

In line with that statement, my predecessor and right hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) subsequently agreed a number of measures to ensure that the inquiries would, while having the resources to establish the full facts in each case, operate in a cost-effective manner. These measures included maximum hourly rates payable for publicly funded legal representation by counsel and solicitors; and a 40-hour cap on hours that might be claimed in any given week. The chairmen of all three inquiries have taken the need to ensure that the inquiries operate in a cost-effective manner seriously, and I am grateful to them for that.

The inquiry considering the death of Robert Hamill is now underway under the chairmanship of Sir Edwin Jowitt. Following representations from him my predecessor granted his request to be converted into an inquiry under the Inquiries Act 2005 under section 15 of that Act.

Section 40(4) of the Inquiries Act contains a power for a Secretary of State to place conditions or qualifications on any awards that the chairman of the inquiry may make under section 40(1) and 40(2) in respect of compensation, expenses or legal representation. After discussions with the inquiry, I have decided today to issue the following notice of determination under section 40(4) in respect of awards for legal representation. This notice will not alter the substance of those sections of the inquiry's costs protocol concerned with the award of funding for legal assistance, but it will reinforce the limits on hourly rates that may be claimed by legal representatives.

A similar notice has been issued in relation to the Billy Wright inquiry following that inquiry's request to my predecessor to be converted under the Inquiries Act.

These measures, which will help ensure continued value for money, have been discussed with the chairman of the inquiry and I know will have the support of hon. and right hon. Members and the general public.

Notice of Determination by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to the Chairman of the Robert Hamill Inquiry Under Section 40(4) Of The Inquiries Act 2005

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has determined under section 40(4) of the Inquiries Act 2005 ("the Act") that the power of the Chairman of the Robert Hamill Inquiry to award amounts in respect of legal representation under section 40(1) and (2) of the Act to persons eligible for an award under section 40(3) shall be subject to the qualifications and conditions set out below, which supplement and are in addition to the terms and conditions in the costs protocol on the public funding of legal assistance published by the Inquiry on 19 November 2007.

2. The qualifications and conditions are:

(a) The maximum, hourly rates for counsel and solicitors shall be:

Leading Counsel (whether a member of the Bar or a solicitor acting in the role of advocate) £200;

Junior Counsel (whether a member of the Bar or a solicitor acting in the role of advocate) £100;

Solicitors £150.

(b) The maximum number of hours that can be charged in respect of each member of a legal team in receipt of an award made by the chairman under section 40(2) of the Act shall be 40 hours per week, save that, exceptionally, the chairman of the inquiry may authorise an increase in the weekly cap to 60 hours for counsel or a solicitor during the oral hearings and for a two month period before they commence where he is satisfied that such action is justified, for example, where the work involved in any week clearly needs to exceed 40 hours.

3. In respect of paragraph 2 (b) of this notice:

(i) no unused hour in any week may be set off against any other week;

(ii) a week should be taken as commencing on Monday and ending on Sunday.

TREASURY

2007 UK Convergence Programme

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Kitty Ussher): Copies of the 2007 UK Convergence Programme have been deposited in the Libraries of both Houses.

BUSINESS, ENTERPRISE AND REGULATORY REFORM

Employment Agencies and Employment

The Minister for Employment Relations and Postal Affairs (Mr. Pat McFadden): The Government have laid the Conduct of Employment Agencies and Employment Businesses (Amendment) Regulations 2007 in Parliament for debate in the House of Commons and the Lords. These regulations amend the Conduct of Employment Agencies and Employment Businesses Regulations 2003.

These amending regulations make further provision for the proper conduct of employment agencies and employment businesses; they increase protection for work-seekers, reduce certain regulatory burdens on employment businesses and also make minor clarifications to the 2003 regulations.

The Government published a consultation paper on "Protecting Vulnerable Agency Workers" at the beginning of the year. This consultation paper followed up the commitment to take forward measures identified in the Success at Work, the Government's 2006 labour market strategy paper.

Measures set out in the consultation document included giving work-seekers a clear right to withdraw from accommodation, transport or other services provided by an agency without suffering any detriment, and banning the taking of fees at casting sessions held by talent-spotting agencies, and possibly for up to a week afterwards, to give would-be entertainers and models the protection of a cooling off period. We are now taking these proposed measures forward into legislation following widespread support from those who responded to the consultation paper.

We are also introducing a measure, proposed in the consultation paper, to ease administrative burdens on employment businesses, by reducing the information requirements where they provide workers for very short assignments, of less than five days duration.

In the consultation the Government made clear its aim that amendments to the existing regulations should come into force in April 2008.

The South West of England Regional Development Agency

The Minister for Competitiveness (Mr. Stephen Timms): I have decided to appoint the new board members listed as follows.

Brian Robinson

The new appointments will all be for a period of three years.

I have also decided to re-appoint Nick Buckland for a further period of three years.

The appointments will begin on 14 December 2007 and will expire on 13 December 2010.

I have placed further details of the new appointments in the Library of both Houses. They were all made in accordance with the code of practice of the Commissioner for Public Appointments.

Biographies for those appointed

Ellen Winser—After 25 years in the City where she was the first woman to be taken into partnership by a London firm of stockbrokers (James Capel and Co.) and one of the first women members of the Stock Exchange, Ellen went off long distance sailing with her husband in 1990. In the next five years they visited 40 countries and sailed 50,000 miles. On return Ellen became involved with a variety of organisations in Cornwall and was also chairman of Liontrust Asset Management plc from 1996 to 2004. She is now Chairman of the Governors of Truro College and is also Chairman of the Trustees of the National Maritime Museum Cornwall, a governor of the University of Plymouth and a director of Pendennis Shipyard Ltd. She was Chairman of Sutton Harbour Holdings plc from 1997 until earlier this year and was a director/trustee of Cornwall Care Ltd. for eight years. She became a Deputy Lieutenant for Cornwall in 2003.

Brian Robinson—Has a track record developed in the financial services sector initially as an underwriter and then switching to marketing where he played a key role in the merger of Eagle Star Insurance and Zurich Financial Services. More recently he has turned his efforts to the SME sector, starting a Marketing and Risk Consultancy in 2002 and a Credit Management Software Company in 2004.

He was elected to the Forest of Dean District Council in May 2007 and was appointed Chairman of the Corporate Scrutiny and Review Committee and in December he joins the cabinet with a portfolio of Efficiency and Finance. He is a Fellow of the Chartered Insurance Institute and Chartered Institute of Marketing.

Nick Buckland—Has spent 20 years working as a senior manager in the UK IT industry, mainly for US companies. In 1996 he took a career change taking an interest in a number of activities. He holds a number of non-executive directorships in a variety of companies including a veterinary clinical pathology laboratory, an integrated marketing company, an IT integrator and a rural tourism company. He is Chairman of Tamar Science Park and is Managing Partner of an IT headhunting organisation, and sponsorship management consultancy. He represents the RDA on the Devon and Cornwall Learning and Skills Council and is a member of the BERR Technology Strategy Board. He is an observer on the Regional Science and Industry Council.

He also sits on the boards of Finance Cornwall, Finance South West, Cornwall Enterprise and is a Governor of Plymouth University. He has a BSc in Mathematics, is a Fellow of the British Computer Society, the Institute of Mathematics and its Applications and the RSA. He is also a member of the Chartered Management Institute, the Institute of Directors and the Royal Institution. He is a Chartered Engineer, Chartered Information Systems Practitioner and a European Engineer.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH OFFICE

Commonwealth heads of Government Meeting (Kampala - November 2007)

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (David Miliband): The Commonwealth Heads of Government will hold their biannual meeting in Kampala on 23 and 25 November 2007.

The purpose of this statement is to inform the House about the Government's objectives for the meeting.

The Commonwealth today is as important to the UK as ever. That is why the Prime Minister and four other members of Government—the Secretary of State for International Development, Baroness Vadera, Lord Malloch-Brown and I—will attend the Heads of Government meeting. It is a group of countries which cuts across traditional regional, economic groupings and, with a fundamental set of principles in common, is well placed to take action and move the debate forward on issues of critical, global importance. Its strengths are the democratic values it shares and its willingness to scrutinise its members and hold them to account; the size of its constituency, with over a quarter of the world's population living in Commonwealth nations; and its diversity.

The Government are optimistic about what can be achieved at CHOGM. We will be seeking outcomes, in particular, that will give positive impetus to the climate change debate, re-focus attention on the millennium development goals, promote education for all and recognise the vital importance of trade to all Commonwealth members.

Uganda's chosen theme for CHOGM—"Transforming Commonwealth societies to achieve political, economic and human development", fits well with UK priorities. Climate Change, the Millennium Development Goals, Trade, and Education issues must be urgently addressed if the poorest Commonwealth countries are to fulfil their potential.

CHOGM will also provide the platform for valuable discussion on other issues of common concern, including extending Commonwealth membership and working to fight radicalism and intolerance.

Specific outcomes that the Government hope to achieve from CHOGM include the following:

Climate Change: CHOGM, coming just a week before the UN meeting in Bali, provides an excellent opportunity to underline the scale and urgency of the climate threat. We hope Commonwealth Heads will send an unequivocal message that to achieve climate security we need a high-ambition, UN-based global framework with developed countries taking on binding emission reduction commitments. We also hope Heads will agree to ensure that all Commonwealth countries, particularly the poorest and most vulnerable, can assess the implications of climate change for their economies.

Millennium Development Goals: Four Commonwealth countries, India, Ghana, Canada and the UK, have already signed the 31 July Call to Action Declaration. We hope that Commonwealth countries will agree that a wide group of international stakeholders must take urgent action to get the Commonwealth and the world back on track to meet these goals. We also hope they will urge the UN Secretary-General to convene a UN meeting in 2008 that brings together Heads Of Government with leaders from the private sector, civil society and faiths to recommit to and accelerate the action that is needed.

Education: Within the Commonwealth there are about 30 million children of primary school age who are not enrolled in education. We want the Commonwealth to accelerate and sustain access to primary education for all, including working to eliminate gender disparities in education. We will be urging Heads of Government to endorse the agreements made at the Commonwealth Education Ministers' meeting in Cape Town in December 2006. Our objective is that Commonwealth countries will place a renewed emphasis on education quality at all levels, and the measurement and improvement of learning. Together we will examine how we can make demonstrable progress on vital literacy, counting and writing outcomes for primary aged children.

Trade: We will urge our Commonwealth counterparts to join us in calling for the early, pro-development conclusion of the Doha Round, which will benefit the poorest of the Commonwealth countries. We will also be calling on all CHOGM countries in a position to do so to extend Aid for Trade to Commonwealth developing countries. Aid for Trade projects are often best done at a regional level between trading neighbours and the Commonwealth is well placed to support such regional co-operation.

The Commonwealth is rightly proud of the values that define it. Its preparedness to scrutinise members in serious or persistent violation of the Harare Principles is a useful tool in bringing governments to account. CHOGM will focus international attention on Uganda. During CHOGM UK Ministers will raise progress in the Northern Uganda peace process with the Ugandan Government, as well as internal governance and human rights.

The Government are also deeply concerned by situation in Pakistan. CMAG has sent a clear message. The Government hopes that Pakistan will send the right response before CHOGM.

Middle East

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (David Miliband): I visited Israel, the Occupied Palestinian Territories and Egypt between 17 and 20 November. I met Presidents Abbas and Peres, Prime Ministers Olmert and Fayyad, Foreign Ministers Livni, Malki and Aboul Gheit as well as French Foreign Minister Kouchner, Ministers Barak and Suleiman, the Arab League Secretary General Amr Moussa, and the leader of the Likud Party, Benjamin Netanyahu. I also heard different perspectives from students, business people, university directors and deans, journalists and civil society activists. I spoke to them all about the current situation in the region, the prospects for progress towards a just and lasting settlement of the Middle East conflict, preparations for the forthcoming Annapolis meeting, the post-Annapolis process, and how the UK can contribute.

The bedrock of our approach on the Middle East Peace Process is threefold—first, to be unstinting in our support for the principle of a two-state solution; second, to give every support to all those who are committed to peaceful progress in the region; and third, to support economic, institutional and social development across the OPTs. The focus now must be on: maximising consensus for a positive outcome at Annapolis; launching a process of negotiations between the parties that makes real progress during 2008 towards the shared goal of a viable Palestinian state next to a secure Israel; and developing practical contributions from international partners towards economic, social and security goals.

I do not underestimate the difficulties but my firm conclusion is that there is now a real opportunity for making progress. The leadership commitment of Israel and the Palestinian Authority, the full engagement of the US, the important Arab Peace Initiative, and the united support of EU countries, are all key components of progress. I was impressed by the level of seriousness on all sides. I urged all my interlocutors to seize the opportunity that Annapolis represents—a political horizon to break the freeze that has existed for several years.

We are working closely with our international partners to support the Annapolis process, led with real determination by the US. As the Prime Minister has noted, the road from Annapolis will be as important as the road there. Although as both sides have made clear, it is for them to negotiate the details of a two-state solution, the international community has offered its support and encouragement and the UK stands ready to help them move forward.

For the UK this means supporting the Palestinian leadership of Mahmoud Abbas and Salam Fayyad in two key areas: security and economic development.

Security is fundamental to a just solution. I visited Jericho to see the EU's civil police training mission (EU COPPS), a mission initiated by the UK which underlines our continuing commitment to enhancing the security capacity of the Palestinian Authority. I am pleased that the UK has been able to increase its commitment by £1.2 million. We are also working closely with General Dayton, the US Security Co-ordinator, and his team including through the provision of additional security advisers.

Economic development is crucial in building a viable Palestinian state. The Prime Minister announced last week a commitment of up to $500 million to Palestinian development, conditional on progress towards peace and creating the necessary conditions. We are working closely with Tony Blair, who announced the first major projects yesterday. His work will be central to delivering a future Palestinian state with strong institutions and a robust economy. We are preparing for the Donors Conference to be hosted by France in Paris on 17 December.

The humanitarian situation in Gaza continues to give cause for concern. We recognise Israel's security dilemma, and deplore the rocket attacks that endanger Israeli citizens. It is equally imperative that measures in response be consistent with international law and not cause suffering to innocent civilians. We have made clear our determination to continue supporting all the Palestinian people. In addition to the significant sums we have just pledged, the UK provided in 2007: (i) £100 million over the next five years to UNRWA; (ii) an additional £1 million bilateral contribution to the Red Cross' work in the West Bank and Gaza; and (iii) £15 million through the Temporary International Mechanism. Restrictions on movement and access, both through the crossings into Gaza and the restrictions in the West Bank, have serious economic, social and security consequences that require the urgent attention of the Palestinian Authority and Israeli Government.

Over the next week I will continue to urge all parties to take decisions which create the conditions and confidence for a successful conference and follow-up. I welcome the statement of Prime Minister Olmert yesterday about settlements and outposts. I look forward to further commitments from all those concerned with this conflict to make a practical and political contribution to a meaningful process of negotiations. Such a process is vital to regional and global stability. The UK will play its full part in this drive.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Bangladesh (Cyclone Sidr)

The Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Douglas Alexander): Tropical cyclone "Sidr" hit Bangladesh on 15 and 16 November. The death toll is uncertain but likely to rise to about 10,000 people. Some 300,000 houses have been destroyed. Many crops have been destroyed and large tracts of agricultural land damaged. This will make livelihoods for hundred of thousands of farmers difficult for at least the next six months. Government and relief organisations are providing emergency relief in the affected areas. In total, around US$ 25 million has been promised to the Government and NGOs from the international community.

Although the cyclone has had a devastating impact on people, the casualties and damage would have been much worse without the early warning system and contingency measures taken by the authorities. The Government of Bangladesh have acted promptly to bring relief to the affected people and the UK is glad to be supporting this response.

The Department for International Development has announced a contribution of £2.5 million for immediate cyclone relief efforts. The money is being channelled through the UN, and will help provide food, water, medical treatment, and housing repairs. A rapid UN assessment is being completed in the next 48 hours. We will consider our response to additional needs identified, monitor delivery in conjunction with the UN and help the Government of Bangladesh. Further funding will be considered over the next few months.

JUSTICE

Government Response to the Committee on Standards in Public Life's Eleventh Report 'Review of the Electoral Commission'

The Secretary of State for Justice and Lord Chancellor (Mr. Jack Straw): I have today published the Government response to the Committee on Standards in Public Life's eleventh report "Review of the Electoral Commission" (Cm 7272).

On behalf of the Government, I would like to thank the former Chairman, Sir Alistair Graham, interim Chair, Rita Donaghy, and members of the Committee on Standards in Public Life for their hard work in conducting a review of the Electoral Commission and producing a detailed and stimulating report. The Government are grateful to the Committee for thoroughly examining the issues and making recommendations for improvement. This was a useful review marking some six years since the Electoral Commission was created.

Some of the Committee's recommendations are directed at Government, while others are directed at the Electoral Commission and the Speaker's Committee. The Electoral Commission and Association of Electoral Administrators published responses in March and April respectively. The Speaker's Committee published its response to the recommendations relevant to it in August. The Government have carefully considered and taken into account the views of these and other interested parties before publishing their own response.

The Government are committed to a strong, effective and independent Electoral Commission, and are keen to take forward recommendations which they believe will enable the Electoral Commission to more effectively carry out its dual role as regulator of party funding and campaign expenditure, and electoral administration.

The importance of a proactive, focused and effective Electoral Commission, acting as a strong regulator is vital to protecting and enhancing the health of our democratic system.

The Government are committed to working with the Electoral Commission and other relevant bodies to put in place necessary arrangements and legislation to assist the Electoral Commission in improving its overall effectiveness.

OLYMPICS

Legacy Trust

The Minister for the Olympics (Tessa Jowell): Legacy Trust will be formally launched today.

Legacy Trust has been established to help to ensure a celebration of the London 2012 Olympic Games and Paralympic Games across the United Kingdom and to help create a lasting legacy.

The trust will use £40 million funding endowed by the Department for Culture, Media and Sport (£6 million), the Art Council England (£5 million), the Big Lottery Fund (£5 million), and the Millennium Commission (£24 million—since been transferred to the Big Lottery Fund) to deliver a programme of cultural and sporting activities at local, regional and national level. The trust will form partnerships with organisations that will deliver the supported programmes.

Following an open competition, the Legacy Trust proposal submitted by a consortium of five organisations, was selected as the preferred candidate. The consortium created an independent Charitable Trust (known as Legacy Trust UK), and a Corporate Trustee (known as Legacy Trust UK Ltd.). The corporate trustee is a company limited by guarantee. It worked up a full business case, which the funding bodies were content with. The funding has recently been transferred. It will start operating immediately, and distributing the bulk of the funds from 2008 onwards.

The trust plans to support a small number of national programmes, including the UK School Games, the Big Arts Week (working title) and the World Festival of Youth Culture (working title). The remainder of the endowment will be distributed throughout the three nations (Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland) and nine English regions. In doing so, it will work closely with the London Organising Committee for the Olympic Games and Paralympic Games (LOCOG).

TRANSPORT

Crossrail Bill: Publication of Command Papers

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Tom Harris): At the Third Reading of the Crossrail Bill, this House will be asked to approve the Bill and, in so doing, give its approval to the building of Crossrail. Under the Environmental Impact Assessment (EIA) Directive, decision-making bodies are required to consider the environmental effects of projects when deciding whether or not they should be allowed to proceed. To assist the House in its consideration, the Government has today published a Command Paper entitled "Government Overview of the Case for Crossrail and Its Environmental Impacts" (Command Paper 7250). The Command Paper summarises the work done to assess, control and mitigate the environmental impacts of Crossrail, and explains why the Government continue to take the view that the Crossrail project is worthy of its support. It also contains a list of other relevant documents and where they may be found.

We have also published today a Command Paper containing further responses following consultation on the Crossrail Bill Environmental Statement (Command Paper 7249: Further responses to the Government's Consultation on the Crossrail Bill Environmental Statement). To obtain an overall picture of the responses received, Members should also consider Command Paper 6603 (Responses to the Government's Consultation on the Crossrail Bill Environmental Statement) which was published in July 2005.

Copies of Command Papers 7249 and 7250 are available in the Library of the House. They can also be found on the Department for Transport website at: www.dft.gov.uk

Written Ministerial Statements

EU Competitiveness Council (Brussels)

The Minister for Competitiveness (Mr. Stephen Timms): I will be attending the EU Competitiveness Council in Brussels on 22 November.

The main substantive item will be an "integrated approach to competitiveness" covering industry policy, e-skills, small and medium-sized enterprises, succeeding in the age of globalisation, and European competitiveness. This will compromise the presentation of communications from the Commission, adoption of Council conclusions, and will be followed by an exchange of views on all five items. The UK will argue strongly in favour of a presumption towards openness when developing the EU's external policies.

Further agenda items for which BERR is responsible are:

Better regulation (progress report followed by an exchange of views). This will be an opportunity for Ministers to debate the issue of how to improve legislation coming from Europe in advance of a review by the European Commission early next year, which will look at better understanding the economic impact of regulation, better consultation and keeping red tape to a minimum.

Communication from the Commission on a "simplified business environment for companies in the areas of company law, accounting and auditing"

(adoption of Council conclusions). The UK will look to agree the text of conclusions, offering strong support for the Commission's simplification programme for company law.

Communication from the Commission on

"enhancing the patent system in Europe"

(progress report followed by an exchange of views). The Portuguese presidency has laid solid foundations for further work towards a European patent court and the UK welcomes their efforts, but, as their report recognises, further work needs to be done to ensure the creation of a high-quality, efficient and affordable jurisdiction that delivers clear benefits to innovative businesses in Europe.

Proposal to amend the timeshare directive (progress report followed by an exchange of views). The UK is pleased with progress to date and hopes to see further progress in resolving the remaining issues.

Communication from the Commission on "Agenda for sustainable and competitive European tourism" (presentation by the Commission followed by adoption of Council conclusions). The UK supports the Commission policy paper and conclusions, which recognise the importance of the development of tourism as a competitive economic activity, the need to balance this with environmental and social aims, and respond to the aims set out by the Lisbon agenda.

There will be nine further items taken under any other business:

Review of the Single Market (Information from the Commission)

Free movement of goods (Information from the presidency)

Classification, labelling and packaging of substances and mixtures (Information from the presidency)

Events during the Portuguese presidency (Information from the presidency)

The Internet of Things (Information from the presidency)

Product safety (Information from the Commission)

Services of general interest (Information from the Commission)

Trade defence instruments (Information from the Commission)

Legal protection of designs (Information from the presidency)

DEFENCE

Winter Supplementary Estimates (2007-08)

The Secretary of State for Defence (Des Browne): My written ministerial statement of 15 November 2007, Official Report, Vol. 467, c. 68-69WS, contained an error in the opening paragraph. The correct text is:

Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the Ministry of Defence Departmental Expenditure Limits (DEL) will be increased by £2,033,379,000 from £33,561,172,000 to £35,594,551,000.

HEALTH

Patient Satisfaction (NHS Cleanliness)

The Secretary of State for Health (Alan Johnson): Patients rightly expect high standards of cleanliness and hygiene in all National Health Service settings.

Today, the National Patient Safety Agency (NPSA) is publishing information on the 2007 inspection results of the Patient Environment Action Teams. In 2000, we introduced Patient Environment Action Teams (PEAT), which, each year, assess every in-patient health care facility in England with more than 10 beds. The inspection looks at issues of hospital cleanliness, the quality of the environment, food and at issues of privacy and dignity.

Figures published today by the NPSA show that in 2007, 98 per cent. of hospitals were rated excellent, good or acceptable: up from 95 per cent. in 2006. This is against a more rigorous process in 2007 than for 2006 for the inspection process for PEAT.

The full data are available from the NPSA website http://www.npsa.nhs.uk/peat.

As part of our drive to improve cleanliness further, my Department recently announced a deep clean of all our hospitals to supplement ongoing cleaning. My Department is making available further information on the funding to support the deep clean of the NHS at regional level. The following table outlines the indicative spending intentions for each SHA area. All trusts will have to submit detailed deep clean plans, including costs to their primary care trusts and strategic health authorities. Foundation trusts will also be invited to agree plans and funding for additional deep cleaning with local commissioners. Trusts are aiming to complete all deep cleans by 31 March 2008.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Animal Procedures Committee (Annual Report)

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Meg Hillier): In accordance with Section 20(5) of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986, I have placed the Committee's annual report for 2006 in the Library today. Among other things the report includes:

the work carried out by the Committee's sub-committees;

the advice offered by the Committee on a project licence application that was referred to the Committee for advice;

acceptance of overseas centres supplying non-human primates to UK laboratories: a report by the Primates sub-committee of the Animals Procedure Committee;

the completion and publication of our review of Schedule 1 to the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1985: Appropriate methods of humane killing; the publication of an update for the housing and care of animals used in scientific procedures, an aide-mémoire for users and staff comparing proposed changes to European legislation to existing UK codes of practice;

the publication of a report of the Education and Training Sub-committee on modular training for the use of animals in scientific procedures;

the report concludes with the Committee's work plan for 2007.

INNOVATION, UNIVERSITIES AND SKILLS

EU Competitiveness Council (Brussels)

The Minister for Science and Innovation (Ian Pearson): I am pleased to confirm the agenda items for which DIUS is responsible, at the forthcoming EU Competitiveness Council on 23 November in Brussels. The Council will be chaired by Mr. Gago, Portuguese Minister for Science, Technology and Higher Education. I will be attending.

There are seven substantive agenda items:

political agreement on compromise text on a proposal for a Regulation of the European Parliament and the Council establishing the European Institute of Technology (BIT), before the European Parliament Second Reading; a possible general approach on Council Regulations establishing Joint Undertakings to implement Joint Technology Initiatives (JTIs) for Innovative Medicines (IMI); Aeronautics and Air Transport (Clean Sky); Embedded Computing Systems (ARTEMIS) and Nanoelectronics (ENIAC), with the view to move to agreement on these regulations later in the year. The UK supports the objectives of these JTIs which we see as important for engaging UK businesses in European research and would like to see them launched by the end of this year; a possible general approach on a proposal for a European Parliament and Council Decision on the Ambient Assisted Living initiative. The UK is supportive of the general aims of AAL and the Technology Strategy Board is intending to participate in the initiative; possible adoption of Council on The Future of Science and Technology in Europe; possible adoption of Council on Scientific information in the digital age: access, dissemination and preservation. The UK supports the subject to securing satisfactory text on the issue of pricing; possible adoption of a Council Resolution on modernising universities for Europe's competitiveness in a global knowledge economy; possible adoption of draft Council on the implementation of the nanosciences and nanotechnologies Action Plan for Europe. The UK supports the conclusions.

There will be two further items taken under Any Other Business:

(i) proposal for a European Parliament and Council Decision for a Joint National Research Programme (Article 169 of the Treaty Initiative) on Research Performing SMEs (EuroSTARS) (Information from the Presidency and the Commission on the state of play);

(ii) proposal for a Council Regulation setting up the Fuel Cells and Hydrogen Joint Undertaking. (Presentation by the Commission)

Written Ministerial Statements

Thursday 22 November 2007

TREASURY

Budget ECOFIN

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Kitty Ussher): Items on the agenda are as follows:

Preliminary Draft Amending Budget No. 7 for 2007—Finance Ministers will be invited to adopt Preliminary Draft Amending Budget 7. This would amend the 2007 budget to reflect latest implementation capacity.

Letter of Amendment No. 2 to the Preliminary Draft Budget for 2008—Finance Ministers will be invited to adopt amending letter 2 to the Preliminary Draft Budget for 2008. The letter reflects latest information on agricultural prices and other developments influencing future implementation capacity.

Draft Budget for 2008—The Council will look to agree their second reading of the 2008 Draft Budget and finalise figures for compulsory expenditure (mainly agriculture), in preparation for the subsequent Conciliation with the European Parliament. The UK will seek a budget that respects the principles of budget discipline and sound financial management and reflects realistic forecasts for agriculture and structural funds spending.

BUSINESS, ENTERPRISE AND REGULATORY REFORM

East of England Regional Development Agency

The Minister for Competitiveness (Mr. Stephen Timms): I have decided to appoint the new Board Members listed below.

Stuart Evans

Beverley Hurley

The new appointments will all be for a period of three years.

I have also decided to re-appoint Marco Cereste for a further period of three years

The appointments will begin on 14 December 2007 and will expire on 13 December 2010.

I have placed further details of the new appointments in the Libraries of both Houses. They were all made in accordance with the code of practice of the Commissioner for Public Appointments.

BIOGRAPHIES

Marco Cereste

Marco is currently coming to the end of his second term as an EEDA Business Board Member. He has built a very successful and diverse group of family business operating in the UK and Italy which he now chairs. Marco was elected for a second time earlier this year to the Peterborough council after a five year gap. He has also worked in the NHS for 22 years and is Chair of the Peterborough Primary Care NHS Trust and Anglia Support Partnership. He is Deputy Chair of the Greater Peterborough Partnership and holds a number of other non-executive directorships including Standard Life Healthcare and the Peterborough Urban Regeneration Company. He has been an elected member of the C.G.I.E; this council meets at the Italian Foreign Office in Rome and represents all the Italians not resident in Italy. In 2002 he was awarded the title of Grand Ufficiale, the highest honour in Italy's oldest order. Marco was previously appointed to the EEDA Board by a Minister. He has obtained office as a local councillor, has held office as chair, treasurer and secretary of the local branch of the Conservative Party and canvassed on behalf of the party.

Stuart Evans

Stuart Evans is an entrepreneur and Chartered Director. He was the founding CEO of Plastic Logic Ltd. a highly successful Cambridge University spin out that has won £75 million investment in potentially world-changing plastic electronics technology, initially for flexible displays in electronic books and newspapers. He has a Cambridge BA/MA, Harvard MBA and a twenty year international career of successful venture capital backed technology start-ups. His business skills include:-fund raising, building teams, spin-outs, exits and acquisitions, sales and marketing, corporate governance and turnarounds. He is a non-executive director of Huntingdon-based Pursuit Dynamics plc. and a Trustee of the Arthur Rank Hospice Charity in Cambridge. Stuart holds no other ministerial appointment and has not undertaken any political activity in the last five years.

Beverley Hurley

Beverly started out in social housing and regeneration in inner city London. Her career then took her to Canada, where she helped pioneer a major change management project for a global gold mine. On returning to the UK, Bev established two more successful businesses prior to joining YTKO, a thriving consultancy specialising in the commercialisation of science and technology innovation. Becoming CEO in 1999, she has led the company's expansion into Europe, adding strategic marketing and investment services for high-growth start-ups, and increasing the company's business support services for the public sector. She created the Norfolk Network to stimulate greater enterprise and innovation in the county, and leads the Enterprising Women programme across the East of England. Bev holds a number of public positions including Prowess and the Norfolk Exchange, and is an Enterprise Fellow at the UEA's Business School. Beverly holds no other ministerial appointment and has not undertaken any political activity in the last five years.

Manufacturing Strategy

The Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform (Mr. John Hutton): The Government's Manufacturing Strategy has proved to be a valuable framework, successfully developing programmes such as the Manufacturing Advisory Service and National Skills Academy for Manufacturing, while targeting financial support in key areas such as science.

The UK is the sixth largest manufacturing country in the world. It represents 14 per cent. of GDP, accounts for more than half of our exports, three quarters of business R&D and directly supports 2.9 million jobs.

But rapid global and technological advances are changing the economic challenges for manufacturers in Britain. China and India already account for nearly 50 per cent. of world real GDP growth. Their importance as a driver for future growth is set to continue in 2008 and beyond.

The Government are committed to helping strengthen the future of our manufacturing sector by supporting companies to embrace new opportunities in increasingly competitive global markets. We will therefore renew our Manufacturing Strategy over the coming months to address that challenge. The renewed strategy will pay particular attention to opportunities for Britain to lead global markets created by the need to tackle climate change.

I am today announcing the formulation of a Ministerial Advisory Group to help renew the Manufacturing Strategy. This new group will be made up of a core membership of CBI, TUC, Engineering Employers Federation, Technology Strategy Board, and Regional Development Agency together with representatives from industry and trade unions. The group will report to my right hon. Friend, the Minister of State for Competitiveness and provide advice on key areas impacting on all aspects of manufacturing.

The Government will seek the views of manufacturers and other stakeholders across the UK in developing the strategy. A number of regional events will be undertaken as part of the process, which will be co-ordinated with regional Ministers and regional offices.

Full details of the Ministerial Advisory Group membership will be announced shortly. This group replaces the Manufacturing Forum, to whom I am extremely grateful for their work in steering the manufacturing strategy from 2004-07.

CHILDREN, SCHOOLS AND FAMILIES

Early Years (Capital Funding)

The Minister for Children, Young People and Families (Beverley Hughes): I am announcing today £642 million of capital investment in early years settings from 2008-09 to 2010-11 to ensure every child can access high quality provision. This funding will play a key part in enabling local authorities to meet their duties to secure sufficient childcare in their area, to improve outcomes for children in the early years and to narrow the gaps between the most disadvantaged children and others.

This capital funding will focus in particular on the private, voluntary and independent (PVI) sector to ensure that all settings are of the highest quality and that all children—including those with disabilities—are able to access provision. The grant will also support small sessional providers to make the investments needed to deliver childcare more flexibly.

The grant aims to: (i) improve the quality of the learning environment in early years settings to support delivery of the Early Years Foundation Stage, with a particular emphasis on improving play and physical activities and ICT resources, (ii) ensure that all children, including those with disabilities, can access provision in line with the new duty placed on local authorities in the Childcare Act 2006, (iii) enable PVI providers to deliver an extended free early education offer for all three and four-year-olds and make access more flexible.

Home Information Packs

The Minister for Housing (Yvette Cooper): The Government set out their approach and criteria for phasing the implementation of Home Information Packs (HIPs) including Energy Performance Certificates on 11 June. Sixty per cent of the market is now covered by HIPs. And the criteria for roll out to the rest of the market have now been met. We will therefore complete the phased roll out by extending coverage to the rest of the market from 14 December.

First time buyers of one and two bedroom homes will be the main beneficiaries as they will now get important information about their new home for free. Information such as searches for which they would previously have had to pay will now be included in the HIP paid for by the seller, reducing the costs of the first step onto the property ladder.

But all householders will benefit from having detailed information about the energy efficiency of their home, and measures to save on their fuel bills and cut carbon emissions.

Two hundred thousand Energy Performance Certificates have been generated since the summer. The analysis of the early phase of rollout of HIPs found that the average rating for homes was an E, and we know that approximately one-fifth of all homes are likely to get an F or G rating. This means that basic measures could significantly cut both fuel bills and carbon emissions. The Energy Savings Trust have also estimated that homeowners could also save around £300 a year on fuel bills from implementing the recommendations in the Energy Performance Certificate.

We will establish a new Green Homes Service to offer those buying or selling a home with an F or G rating free or discounted help with energy efficiency measures, by linking them up with grants and loans provided by energy companies and others. Home buyers could potentially be eligible for hundreds of pounds to get help with insulation or other improvements.

As set out in the criteria of 11 June there are now sufficient energy assessors and home inspectors fully qualified and accredited to provide Energy Performance Certificates for all homes bought and sold. Some 5794 people are now accredited.

In addition, the government has also conducted monitoring and analysis of the implementation programme to ensure continued smooth roll out. Early monitoring shows:

HIPs are taking on average seven to 10 days to prepare.

The majority of property, and drainage and water searches, are being delivered within five days

Energy Performance Certificates (EPCs) are being prepared on average within two to four days

On average, a HIP costs between £300 and £350. Most of these are not new costs, as they cover the cost of searches and other documents which have simply been transferred from buyer to seller at the beginning of the process. The Energy Performance Certificate (EPC) is of course new but provides consumers with valuable information of the costs of running their home.

Competition from HIPs is reducing the costs of average property searches. Eighty-five local authorities have already reduced their charges by £30 on average.

The Government have also commissioned and considered extensive analysis by Europe Economics on the impact of HIPs on the market. We are today publishing their independent report which includes modelling on the impact as well as analysis of the first few months of implementation. It finds no evidence of any impact on transactions or prices, although there is a predicted short term impact on new listings as sellers change the timings of their listings. It concludes that the impact on listings is short lived, and the impact on the market is marginal compared to the wider factors.

We also asked Europe Economics and Dr. Peter Williams who is a member of the National Housing and Planning Advice Unit to consider whether changing housing market conditions meant we should change the approach to completing the roll out. Their conclusion was that there are strong arguments for rolling out as planned, and that further delay could cause greater difficulties and uncertainties in the market.

In the light of this evidence therefore we will tomorrow lay the commencement order to extend HIPs and EPCs to one and two bedroom properties from 14 December. In order to ensure continued smooth implementation, we are also extending the temporary provisions on first day marketing for all properties from 1 January to 1 June, providing flexibility for sellers as part of the roll out to one and two bedroom properties.

The implementation of Home Information Packs so far, and the work of the Stakeholder Panel, has also highlighted further improvements that are needed to benefit consumers.

HIPs have already led to improvements in the delivery and cost of searches, with significant reductions in the cost of searches, and in some areas, substantial reductions in the delays in producing searches. However, there are still wide variations in costs and services and we want to see further improvements for consumers. We will therefore publish guidance on access and charging in December for local authorities and personal searchers with the aim of speeding up searches and delivering a fairer deal for consumers.

We have asked Ted Beardsall, Deputy Chief Executive of the Land Registry—and member of our Home Buying and Selling Stakeholder Panel—to advise on what else could be done to improve the search process, ensuring better quality and timeliness of information, and improving value for money for consumers.

Stakeholders have also raised concerns about the costs and timeliness of leasehold information, and the impact that this will have on Home Information Packs when one and two bedroom properties are included given the higher number of leasehold properties. In the majority of cases we would expect leasehold documents to be readily available and easily provided as part of Home Information Packs. However we are aware that some leaseholders, whether in the pre-existing system or creating a HIP, can find the relevant documents difficult to obtain quickly. We know that some also face disproportionate charges to access their documents.

As leasehold information is an important part of the home buying and selling process, and is already generally paid for and provided by the seller, we continue to believe there are considerable advantages to consumers from having leasehold information early on in the Home Information Pack. However, to ensure continued smooth roll out we will phase the introduction of leasehold information in response to stakeholder concerns. We will temporarily amend the HIP regulations so that the lease document itself must be included, but other leasehold information will be introduced as a requirement in six months time. This will allow HIPs for one and two bedroom properties to bed down in advance of leasehold information being required. In the interim, we have also asked Ted Beardsall to advise us and the Home Buying Stakeholder panel on what more can be done to improve the timeliness and cost of leasehold information, alongside the work on searches.

From April 2008, we will begin to roll out EPCs for newly built homes, as well as across commercial property for sale, rent or construction. By October 2008 all public buildings will have a display certificate.

All these measures are designed to promote the interests of the consumer. We will continue to actively monitor the rollout of HIPs and energy performance certificates and the home buying and selling process to ensure we can respond where further improvements are needed. The introduction of HIPs is part of a wider programme of reforms to home buying and selling including e-conveyancing and better redress, which aims to provide consumers with a clearer, more transparent and effective service, with better value for money, benefiting all potential homebuyers and helping in tackling climate change.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Specified Animal Pathogens Order Licence Conditions

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Hilary Benn): I promised to keep the House informed of matters relating to the FMD outbreak. An incident has occurred at the Merial facility on the Pirbright site. While the incident was contained, I thought it right to report the matter given the understandable public interest in this site.

On 6 November, DEFRA restored the Specified Animal Pathogens Order (SAPO) licence to Merial Animal Health to permit the use of FMD and Bluetongue viruses for vaccine production. The licence was restored following detailed DEFRA and HSE inspections that confirmed that the terms of the licence (including operating procedures and installation of security measures) had been fully met and that it was safe for vaccine production to recommence.

The licence requires several layers of biosecurity to be in place. This includes first, a new facility which has been installed to heat treat waste from virus production. Secondly it requires the re-lining, sealing and testing of the effluent pipes and man hole covers as identified in the HSE and Spratt reports. Thirdly, the ground above the drains has been made a contained area and all movements across it controlled with decontamination required of any one who has need to enter that area. Lastly all effluent passes into the chemical treatment facility, which as the final layer of biosecurity would deactivate any live virus. It is monitored and tested daily.

All of these measures provide several independent layers of safety and ensure that the process is contained.

On Monday 19 November Merial discovered a shortfall in the quantity of virus recovered from production batches from the previous week. On inspection of the vaccine production equipment they identified possible technical problems with the functioning of a valve on a pipe leading from the centrifuge which is used to separate live virus from waste product. Operations were immediately stopped and the machine and associated pipework were decontaminated with steam. Citric acid was added in bulk to the effluent sump to disinfect any live virus that might have leaked out of the centrifuge.

Having been contacted on Monday, an engineer examined the machine on the morning of Tuesday 20 November. No problems were identified with the centrifuge, and investigations focussed on a valve on a steam line used to sterilise the associated pipework. This valve separates the live virus product line from the line which provides an outlet for the condensate from the steam cleaning stages. This water should not come in contact with live virus, but as a precaution does enter the contained drainage system leading to the final chemical treatment facility. As part of the SAPO licence, we require Merial to apply rigorous standard operating procedures. In relation to the valves these mean that each time the centrifuge is used two operators must certify that the valve is locked shut and its integrity is confirmed by pressure tests before and after each batch. In addition the preventive maintenance system includes regular inspections and although the valves on the centrifuge have a three-year life expectancy they are replaced annually. All these checks must be recorded.

Despite these measures Merial judged that the valve had been leaking, allowing an unintended probable release of live FMD virus into the contained drainage system, which was then pumped to the final chemical treatment facility without being heat treated.

During the course of Tuesday 20 November Merial arranged for the valve to be replaced and tested the centrifuge to ensure that it was now working properly. Merial informed DEFRA officials at 4pm of this incident and of the action that they had taken. Having learned of this possible breach of a SAPO licence condition, DEFRA suspended Merial's SAPO licence with immediate effect.

A joint DEFRA, HSE and Veterinary Medicine Directorate inspection team visited the site yesterday morning. They confirmed that all work with live virus had stopped, they confirmed the details of the incident that Merial had reported, and carried out detailed inspection, including of record keeping.

The inspection team judge that while it was possible that live FMD virus had entered the contained drainage system, from their discussions and the evidence gathered they are assured that live virus has not been released to the environment. The extensive layers of biosecurity that we require under the SAPO licence effectively contained the virus in the closed, re-lined drainage system before deactivation in the chemical treatment facility.

The SAPO licence remains suspended and the inspection team will produce a full report to the acting chief veterinary officer. We will then consider what further action needs to be taken.

I will report further to the House in due course.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH OFFICE

Entry Clearance Refusals

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (David Miliband): I have today placed in the library a copy of the report by Mrs. Linda Costelloe Baker, the Independent Monitor for Entry Clearance Refusals with Limited Rights of Appeal, covering the period 1 October 2006 to 31 March 2007. A copy is also being made available on the UKvisas website at: www.ukvisas.co.uk together with UKvisas' response to the Monitor's recommendations.

I am most grateful to Mrs. Costelloe Baker for this thorough and positive report based on the 713 sample cases that she has reviewed for the period 1 October 2006 to 31 March 2007.

Mrs. Costelloe Baker commends UKvisas for successfully maintaining a delicate balance between good service and adequate control against a background of major changes in the entry clearance processes—dedicated application centres, a risk assessment basis for decision making and biometric data capture—all benefiting the genuine visitor. She goes on to confirm that the overall quality of entry clearance refusal notices is improving.

Mrs. Costelloe Baker makes a number of constructive recommendations as to how UKvisas can continue to improve the quality of decision making, customer service and complaint handling. UKvisas welcomes these comments and is keen to use these recommendations to drive up the quality of its service to customers whilst maintaining a high level of immigration control.

I wish to record our thanks to Mrs. Costelloe Baker for the work and effort she has put into producing this her third report as Independent Monitor for Entry Clearance Refusals with Limited Rights of Appeal. The Independent Monitor's next report will cover the period 1 April to 30 September 2007 and will be published in the first half of 2008.

HEALTH

Primary Care Trusts (Revenue Allocations)

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): Revenue allocations to primary care trusts (PCTs) will be announced later this year for one year only—2008-09.

The independent Advisory Committee on Resource Allocation has requested and been granted an extension to the work it is doing on reviewing the formula in support of the revenue allocations, post 2007-08. Given that, we wanted to issue the allocations for 2008-09 as soon as possible to give the NHS time to plan. The intention is to announce the 2008-09 allocations shortly, and it is anticipated that the 2009-10 and 2010-11 PCT allocations will be issued by the summer 2008.

In this context and that of the recently announced three year settlement for health in the comprehensive spending review, PCTs should still be able to enter into three-year agreements with local partners where these are appropriate.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Immigration

The Minister for Borders and Immigration (Mr. Liam Byrne): I am today launching the next stage in the Government's comprehensive programme of reform of Britain's immigration controls.

Britain's economy and society profit from migration that is effectively managed and controlled. But our system must change if it is to be fit for the future. Over the next 12 months, we will be introducing fundamental changes. These include:

The points-based system, which will enable us better to manage economic migration. Our points policy will be advised by a Migration Advisory Committee, which will help us make better informed decisions about the migrants our economy needs, and a Migration Impact Forum, which will help us analyse the wider effects of migration;

A Single Border Force, bringing together the Border and Immigration Agency, Customs and UK Visas. This will provide tougher policing at ports and airports with a highly visible, uniformed presence, counting all migrants in and out of the UK;

The introduction of compulsory identity cards for foreign nationals, helping us to know who is here and what they are entitled to do.

If we are to stop illegal journeys, however we must stop illegal jobs. Our attack on illegal working therefore attacks the root cause of illegal immigration into Britain.

Following the Prime Minister's announcement on transforming our border strategy last week I am today announcing action on a further three key parts of our strategy on illegal working.

First, I am publishing a Statement of Intent setting out our approach towards licensing employers or colleges wishing to sponsor migrants for visa applications.

Under the points-based system, employers, and others who benefit from migration and wish to act as sponsors of skilled or temporary migrants, will need a licence to do so. To earn and hold a licence they must agree to fulfil certain duties. Today's Statement of Intent sets out how a would-be sponsor can gain a licence, and what duties we will ask them to perform. We have developed this document working closely with employers' representatives and others to strengthen the Border and Immigration Agency's control of the system.

We are publishing this document today so that those affected can prepare. We are also giving people the opportunity to comment on them. Our proposals may of course change before we finally launch the system. We will give businesses and others the opportunity to apply for sponsorship licences from early 2008.

Secondly, I am publishing today the results of the consultation on the new measures to prevent illegal working in the UK, and the action I now propose to take.

The consultation set out a new system of civil penalties and a tough new criminal offence for those who knowingly employ illegal workers. As a result I propose that the maximum level of penalty should be £10,000 per illegal worker.

The penalty measures we are introducing will provide a more effective means of encouraging employers to carry out proper checks and of dealing with non-compliance.

The results report is available on the Border and Immigration Agency website at: www.bia.homeoffice.gov.uk and copies of the report have also been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

I am also laying revised codes of practice for employers and the necessary regulations to bring sections 15 to 26 of the 2006 Act into force on 29 February next year, including an order for the approval of each House setting the maximum level of civil penalty that may be imposed for employing an illegal worker.

Thirdly, I am taking steps to raise employers' awareness of these changes and to provide support arrangements.

Employers will need to know how the changes we are making under the points-based system and the new civil penalty regime will affect recruitment and employment practices.

National press advertising will commence immediately, to be followed in January with further advertising in the national press, trade press and on national radio, and direct marketing to employers in relevant sectors.

BIA has now enhanced the verification service for employers I announced in May by broadening the range of categories covered by the service.

Finally, the phased introduction of identity cards for foreign nationals will provide the opportunity to develop employer verification services still further and phase out insecure twentieth century documentation from the checking regime. I will bring forward proposals shortly on the roll-out of mandatory identity cards for foreign nationals.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

UK and the World Bank 2006-07

The Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Douglas Alexander): I have placed in the Libraries of both Houses a copy of a DFID report, "The UK and the World Bank 2006-07".

This report summarises the UK's work with the World Bank from October 2005 (the end of the period covered by the last report) to the end of the bank's financial year 2007 (June 2007). The decision to extend the period covered to the end of June 2007 brings the reporting period in line with the World Bank's financial year and also covers the period running up to the appointment of a new World Bank president.

The report describes the main policy topics which the bank was involved in during this period and how it spent its money in supporting developing countries' efforts to reduce poverty. The report provides a regional breakdown of the bank's work and also describes the bank's efforts to improve the way it operates.

During the period covered, the UK worked closely with the bank to develop the Clean Energy Investment Framework, the Investment Climate Facility and a new governance and anticorruption strategy; and helped secure improvements in the bank's implementation of the good practice principles on conditionality.

The next report will issue in approximately 12 months time and will cover the World Bank financial year 2008 (July 2007-June 2008).

PRIME MINISTER

Numbers and Cost of Special Advisers

The Prime Minister (Mr. Gordon Brown): Listed below are the names of special advisers in post at 22 November 2007, the special advisers' pay ranges for 2007-08, the number of special advisers in each pay band by Department and the total pay bill cost of special advisers for 2006-07.

All special advisers are appointed under terms and conditions set out in the "Model Contract and Code of Conduct for Special Advisers". I am placing in the Libraries of the House revised copies of both documents.

TRANSPORT

Heathrow Airport Consultation

The Secretary of State for Transport (Ruth Kelly): I am today publishing a consultation "Adding Capacity at Heathrow Airport" which covers a range of different proposals for the future development of the airport. The consultation responds to a number of commitments made in the 2003 Air Transport White Paper. It presents the conclusions from three years of detailed analysis to consider whether conditions set on noise, air quality and public transport could be met with the addition of a third runway and proposals for making better use of the existing runways. The White Paper recognised the key importance of Heathrow to both local and national economies, and to our competitiveness internationally. While Heathrow's operations impact on people across and around London, the forecasts included in the consultation indicate that it is possible to add capacity at Heathrow in a way which satisfies the local conditions. We want to make the information widely accessible and are engaging extensively with interested parties to give them the opportunity to test the evidence presented and respond to the consultation.

Aviation plays an essential role in the UK's economic growth and our continued prosperity. The Government consulted widely in 2002 on their air transport policy and set out their conclusions in the 2003 White Paper "The Future of Air Transport". The White Paper set out a sustainable long-term strategy for the development of air travel out to 2030. This policy was reiterated last year in the 2006 "Future of Air Transport Progress Report".

The White Paper identified an urgent need for additional runway capacity in the south-east and supported further development at Heathrow, including a new runway and additional terminal capacity, but only if three local conditions could be met.

First there should be no net increase in the total area of the 57 dBA noise contour. This would be measured at 127 sq km which was the size of the contour in the summer of 2002.

Secondly, being confident of meeting European air quality limits around the airport. The critical local pollutant at Heathrow is nitrogen dioxide (NO_2) where the current European directive imposes limits from 2010.

Thirdly there would need to be improvements in access to the airport by public transport.

The White Paper also considered the scope for greater utilisation of the two existing runways by, for example, the use of mixed mode operations—where runways are used for both arriving and departing aircraft. It identified the need to study the impacts and benefits in detail, which would be subject to the same local conditions as a third runway.

Over the past three years, the Project for the Sustainable Development of Heathrow set up by the Department for Transport and including experts from the Highways Agency, the Civil Aviation Authority, the airport's operator BAA, the Government Office for London and drawing on wider expertise from NATS and technical experts in air quality has considered these options further, including whether, and how, the local conditions could be met. The White Paper made a commitment to further consultation once the work was completed.

The White Paper also recognised the airport operator's arguments for a sixth terminal north of the A4 to realise the full potential of the third runway and made a commitment to consult once further work had been completed on the proposals and their impacts. This consultation invites views on the airport operator's revised proposal for adding a 2,200 m third runway (compared with 3,902 m and 3,658 m for the two existing runways) and a sixth terminal with access to the road and rail network which would enable the airport to handle around 702,000 air traffic movements a year by 2030.

The consultation also invites views on the introduction of 'mixed mode' operations as an interim measure ahead of a new runway subject to the same local conditions as a third runway. One option improves operational resilience at the airport but maintains the current 480,000 air transport movements cap, and another allows an extra 60,000 movements per year.

Depending on the outcome of this consultation, it will be for the airport operator to obtain the necessary consents in accordance with applicable planning rules and with relevant statutory and other criteria.

We would also like views on the results of a review of a number of operational procedures on the existing runways irrespective of any further capacity changes. For example the "Cranford agreement" which generally prohibits easterly departures off the northern runway.

We will make the information widely accessible and give all interested parties the opportunity to respond to the consultation. In addition to the standard consultation processes, my officials will also hold a series of public exhibitions to enable individuals and organisations to find out more and to register their views. All the consultation documentation and further details about how to respond are available on the Department's website at: www.dft.gov.uk/heathrowconsultation.

I am also today publishing the report "UK Air Passenger Demand and CO_2 Forecasts". This report explains our passenger demand and CO_2 forecasting methodologies and provides the latest CO_2 forecasts. The White Paper argued that the aviation sector must fully meet its environmental costs and set out our policy to include aviation in the EU Emissions Trading Scheme so that growth in emissions from 2004-06 levels would be compensated for by equivalent reductions elsewhere in the economy. This approach is entirely consistent with last year's Stern review.

Final policy decisions on adding capacity at Heathrow will be taken at the earliest in the summer 2008 in the light of the results of the consultation.

Copies of the consultation document have been placed in the Library of the House and are available in the Vote Office

Post Office Card Account

The Petition of residents of the Borough of Havering and others,

Declares that the Petitioners believe that the post office network provides a vital service to local communities in both urban and rural areas. The Petitioners are concerned that the threatened withdrawal of services from local post offices, by the Government, will seriously affect the governance and more specifically, efficiency of the postal network, as well as damaging community cohesion around these post offices, which in many cases acts as a central and focal point for local community interaction.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urges the Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise & Regulatory Reform to reverse its announcement to end support for the Post Office Card Account 2010 thereby threatening the viability of thousands of post offices and further urges it to immediately halt its activities designed to kill off the account in advance of that date.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.—[Presented by Andrew Rosindell, Official Report, 24 July 2007; Vol. 463, c. 807.]

[P000036]

Observation from the Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform:

The Post Office is one of a number of ways to deliver Government services and still has an important role to play. The Government cannot ignore that people increasingly want to access services in different ways – using direct debits, ATMs and the phone and Internet. We believe in choice and cannot simply hand over work to the Post Office or force people to use the network.

The Post Office recognises the need to increase its range of services and products and that it needs to adapt to changing shopping habits and give sub-postmasters high quality products to sell which appeal to the needs of today's and tomorrow's customers.

We have supported Post Office Ltd (POL) in its efforts to develop its range of financial service products, with Government's investment having included £500 million for the Horizon project to bring computer systems into every post office throughout the UK.

The current Post Office Card Account contract ends in March 2010. The Government decided that there will be a new service after 2010. This will be available nationally and customers will receive a similar set of services to those currently provided. EU procurement rules require us to tender competitively for this product, in order to ensure that best value for money for the taxpayer is achieved. The intention is to give a single contract and the Post Office is in a strong position to bid.

We have now started the procurement process, the first stage of which was the placement of a notice in the Official Journal of the European Union (OJEU). A copy of the notice has been placed in the Library.

The Government remains committed to allowing people to access their pension and benefit in cash at the Post Office if they choose to do so, and there is a range of accounts which makes that possible. This process will not affect those arrangements. We still believe that being paid into a bank or building society account is the best option for the vast majority of our customers, and around three in four of our customers are paid in this way. It gives them more choice about where and when they get their money, enables them to make savings on some bills by paying by direct debit and get interest on balances on their accounts. Many of these accounts can be used at Post Offices, still generating income for POL, which is also introducing its own new accounts.

DWP customers do not need to take any action at the moment. Existing Post Office Card Account customers can continue to be paid this way and new Post Office card accounts can still be opened. There will be plenty of publicity about the new arrangements in the future.

COMMUNITIES AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT

59 Godolphin Road

The Petition of Residents of the Borough of Hammersmith and Fulham and others,

Declares the Petitioners' serious concerns about the proposed disposal of 59 Godolphin Road, the registered premises of The Hut Association and several other local community organisations.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government to use her powers to reverse the decision of Hammersmith and Fulham Council not to renew the lease of 59 Godolphin Road.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.—[Presented by Mr. Andy Slaughter, Official Report, 5 July 2007; Vol. 462, c. 1165.]

[P000043]

Observation from the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government:

The Government understands and recognises the concerns of local residents in Hammersmith and Fulham about the closure and disposal of local community facilities. However, the Secretary of State does not have legal powers to intervene in local decisions about the disposal or closure of community assets.

That said, the Government's policy is to encourage local authorities and their partners to take a more strategic approach to asset management, including consideration of more community management and ownership of assets, as set in the Quirk review "Making Assets Work" and the Government's response to the Quirk review "Opening the transfer window".

Background/local context

Hammersmith and Fulham reviewed the funding of community and voluntary sector organisations earlier this year in relation to needs/objectives and there were obviously winners and losers as a result of this process. H&F also reviewed the accommodation needs of CVS groups and, although a decision was taken by Cabinet earlier this year to dispose of the three properties in question (for very different reasons), we are informed that discussion is ongoing with the groups concerned in terms of accommodation need and possible relocation.

Coal Mining

The Petition of persons living in the vicinity of the Derwent Valley and the historic Gibside Estate,

Declares that the proposed development of an open cast coal site at a place known as Skons Park will have a detrimental effect on the environment, the development of the area as a tourist destination and on the natural habitat of an area that has for centuries borne the scars of coal mining.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urges the Secretary of State for the Department of Communities and Local Government to consider the negative impacts of this open cast proposal and not approve its development.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.—[Presented by Mr. David Anderson, Official Report, 24 July 2007; Vol. 463, c. 805.] [P000039]

Observation from the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government:

On the basis of the information made available to my Department, a planning application was submitted to Gateshead Borough Council in May 2005 by Halls of Durham, for the development of an open-cast coal site at Skons Park, Whickham in the Derwent Valley, to provide 0.5 million tonnes of coal and fireclay. In March 2006 Gateshead Borough Council refused planning permission for the development. In November 2006 the applicants lodged an appeal against the refusal of planning permission, but in June 2007 the applicants withdrew the appeal. My Department has not been involved in this matter. Until planning permission has been obtained for the development it is not able to proceed.

College Park Community Centre

The Petition of Residents of the Borough of Hammersmith and Fulham and others,

Declares the Petitioners' serious concerns about the closure of College Park Community Centre and the methods in which the decision to close the College Park Community Centre was reached.

The Petitioners therefore request the House of Commons urge the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government to use her powers to reverse the decision to close College Park Community Centre.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.—[Presented by Mr. Andy Slaughter, Official Report, 5 July 2007; Vol. 462, c. 1165.] [P000040]

Observation from the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government:

The Government understands and recognises the concerns of local residents in Hammersmith and Fulham about the closure and disposal of local community facilities. However, the Secretary of State does not have legal powers to intervene in local decisions about the disposal or closure of community assets.

That said, the Government's policy is to encourage local authorities and their partners to take a more strategic approach to asset management, including consideration of more community management and ownership of assets, as set in the Quirk review "Making Assets Work" and the Government's response to the Quirk review "Opening the transfer window".

Planning

The Petition of the residents of Ruislip-Northwood and others,

Declares that Britain's gardens are under increasing threat of destruction arising from inappropriate and unpopular development with local opinion being disregarded and communities left powerless to prevent the infill of green spaces with the loss of precious biodiversity, the increased strain on infrastructure, notably with regard to parking and traffic flow, and the resulting change in the fundamental character of neighbourhoods against local wishes.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Government to bring forward legislation to give stronger protection to gardens in planning law, and to allow elected local councillors to have greater discretion to protect local neighbourhoods.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.—[Presented by Mr. Nick Hurd, Official Report, 16 July 2007; Vol. 463, c. 133.] [P000037]

Observation from the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government:

Whilst there is a considerable need for new housing, the Government recognises that it is important to ensure development is in the right place, and that includes preventing inappropriate development in residential areas or on garden land where it is not sustainable and other sites are available.

The Government believes that what is important is not simply one of how land is defined but how sites are managed for development. Planning policy for housing - Planning Policy Statement 3 - published in November 2006 gives local planning authorities greater flexibility around the location and kind of housing they wish to see in their areas and strengthens the tools that local authorities already had under previous policy to turn down inappropriate development on former residential or garden land. They can specify targets for different kinds of brownfield land, which distinguish between residential sites and other kinds of brownfield land. PPS3 gives local authorities greater powers to restrict garden development if they have alternative viable land available and the level of development within residential areas is much higher than their plan.

The policy also places a much stronger emphasis on the quality of residential design and layout, making clear that design which is inappropriate in its context, or which fails to take the opportunities available for improving the character and quality of an area and the way it functions, should not be accepted. Local authorities also need to assess the extent to which new housing development provides, or enables access to, community green space, open space and private outdoor areas such as gardens, as well as provides for the retention or re-establishment of the biodiversity within residential environments.

PPS3 states in clear terms that there is no presumption that land is suitable for housing simply because it is brownfield, stressing the need for sites to be suitable for housing development, that are in suitable locations, and which will contribute to the creation of sustainable, mixed communities.

Planning (Benfleet)

The Petition of people living around the St. Mary's Church Conservation Area,

Declares that we the residents of Benfleet and surrounding areas object to the proposed demolition of the parade of shops opposite the historic St. Mary's Church, in High Road, Benfleet to make way for a new block of four shops with five one bed and eight two bed flats in a two storey development above the shops with underground parking, on the grounds that the access is unacceptable, there are insufficient parking arrangements, particularly for visitors to those new properties and shops, and consequently the shops and public will suffer, because the bulk of the proposed building would be unacceptably detrimental to the street scene in this sensitive position around the Conservation Area and because this would put unacceptable additional stress on the existing infrastructure at a sensitive point on the highway and for many other valid planning reasons as set out by the Member of Parliament and the previous Council members for the ward, in their objections to the earlier applications which were rejected.

The Petitioners therefore call on the House of Commons to implore the Government to impress upon Castle Point Borough Council, and three Boyce Ward councillors in particular, the imperative that this application is decided by members rather than unelected unaccountable officers, and the need to reject the application on behalf of all residents of Castle Point who are sick to the back teeth of the attempts to overdevelop their community.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.—[Presented by Bob Spink, Official Report, 25 June 2007; Vol. 462, c. 134 .] [P000041]

Observation from the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government:

The application to Castle Point Borough Council is in respect of the demolition of existing retail/residential units and construction of 8 x two bed and 5 x one bed flats and 1 retail units with underground parking. The application was considered at Castle Point Borough Council's Planning Committee on 31 July 2007. The committee resolved that the application be granted conditional approval.

Parliament has entrusted local authorities with responsibility for development control in their areas. It is for them to decide, with particular regard to the provisions of the County Structure and Local Plans, any relevant views expressed by neighbouring occupiers, local residents and other third parties (although they are not bound to accept those views) and any other relevant material considerations which fairly and reasonably relate to the application concerned, whether or not a proposal should be given planning permission. The Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government intervenes in this responsibility only in the most exceptional circumstances and then only when issues of national or regional importance are involved. To do so more often would undermine the responsibility given to local planning authorities.

Once planning permission has been given for a particular development, the Secretary of State has no power to intervene. The only recourse a third party would have would be to challenge the decision to grant planning permission in the High Court.

Planning (Bournemouth)

The Petition of residents of the Borough of Bournemouth and others,

Declares the Petitioners' serious concerns about the overdevelopment in the Bournemouth area and the lack of investment in our infrastructure which are affecting the character of our town.

The Petitioners recognise the need for some development to meet the needs of Bournemouth but believe planning decisions should be made by the local authorities and not influenced by targets set by the South West Regional Assembly.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government to reconsider the impact present planning policy is having on our town, introduce legislation to protect back gardens from overdevelopment, place more emphasis on supporting off-street parking facilities and ensure Bournemouth's Greenbelt is not threatened.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.—[Presented by Mr. Tobias Ellwood, Official Report, 11 July 2007; Vol. 462, c. 1581.] [P000038]

Observation from the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government:

The housing market has not responded sufficiently to meet the needs of the country's ageing and growing population. There is a shortage in the supply of housing, the Government outlined its plans to address this and for delivering the homes that are badly needed in the Green Paper "Homes for the Future: more affordable, more sustainable", published in July 2007, including setting a new housing target for 2016 of 240,000 additional homes a year to meet the growing demand and address affordability issues.

Whilst there is a considerable need for new housing, the Government recognises that it is also important to ensure development is in the right place. This includes preventing inappropriate development in residential areas or on garden land where it is not sustainable and other sites are available.

Planning at the regional level is essential to address regional or sub-regional issues, such as the balance between major areas of housing growth and its supporting infrastructure, that often cross county or unitary and district authority boundaries. However, Government planning policy guidance - Planning Policy Statement 3 - published in November 2006 gives more responsibility than ever before to local authorities to decide how and where new development should be built. The new policy approach gives local authorities more flexibility to shape new development according to the needs of their local areas, and allows them to make decisions on where new housing should be located in those areas. It stresses the need for sites to be suitable to housing development, that are in suitable locations, and which will contribute to the creation of sustainable, mixed communities. In assessing what sites are suitable for inclusion in their plans, local authorities need to consider, amongst other things, the current and future level and capacity of infrastructure to support the proposed distribution of development.

The policy continues the focus on developing suitable brownfield sites wherever possible. The Government has re-emphasised that it has no intention to make fundamental changes to Green Belt policy, which affords strong protection to Green Belt land.

Wormholt Community Centre

The Petition of residents of the Borough of Hammersmith and Fulham and others,

Declares the Petitioners' serious concerns about the closure and disposal of the former Wormholt Library, now Wormholt Tenants and Residents Community Centre, Hemlock Road.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government to use her powers to reverse the decision of Hammersmith and Fulham Council to close and dispose of the former Wormholt Library, now Wormholt Tenants and Residents Community Centre, Hemlock Road.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.—[Presented by Mr. Andy Slaughter, Official Report, 5 July 2007; Vol. 462, c. 1165.] [P000042]

Observation from the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government:

The Government understands and recognises the concerns of local residents in Hammersmith and Fulham about the closure and disposal of local community facilities. However, the Secretary of State does not have legal powers to intervene in local decisions about the disposal or closure of community assets.

That said, the Government's policy is to encourage local authorities and their partners to take a more strategic approach to asset management, including consideration of more community management and ownership of assets, as set in the Quirk review "Making Assets Work" and the Government's response to the Quirk review "Opening the transfer window".

COMMUNITIES AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT

Baby Changing Facility

The Petition of Tracy Taplin, residents of Canvey Island and others,

Declares that the existing public facilities on Canvey Island are inadequate for the needs of those with small children, and notes that Castle Point Borough Council has a de facto duty to provide and maintain suitable public facilities, particularly in a busy shopping area, such as Canvey's excellent shopping centre.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons entreats the Government to bring pressure to bear on Castle Point Borough Council to provide a baby changing unit at a suitable location in Canvey Island's shopping centre.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.—[Presented by Bob Spink, Official Report, 24 July 2007; Vol 463, c 809.] [P000046]

Observation from the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government:

The provision of public conveniences is at the discretion of local authorities. This is therefore a matter for Castle Point Borough Council.

The Department for Communities and Local Government does however recognise that the provision and upkeep of public conveniences is a service valued by many people.

The Department is therefore working with the British Toilet Association and others with a view to developing a strategy that will improve public access to toilets for all members of the public, including those with small children, but will not be introducing legislation to impose a duty on local authorities to provide and maintain public toilets.

Council Tax

The Petition of residents of the Taunton constituency and others,

Declares that the Petitioners are extremely concerned that the determination of Council Tax levels in Taunton Deane and nationally do not fairly reflect the ability of citizens to pay.

Further notes that pensioners and those on a low income are especially disadvantaged as they have to pay a larger proportion of their income towards Council Tax than those with higher incomes.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urges the Government to abolish the Council Tax and replace it with a system that reflects the ability to pay.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.—[Presented by Mr. Jeremy Browne, Official Report, 18 July 2007; Vol. 463, c. 396.] [P000047]

Observation from the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government:

The Government recognises that council tax provokes strong feelings amongst pensioners and those on low incomes. The extensive public consultation that Sir Michael Lyons carried out as part of his independent inquiry showed that clearly. Sir Michael's careful and in-depth examination of the funding of local government nonetheless concluded that council tax is not broken and recommended that it should be retained. The Government supports that conclusion.

As Sir Michael confirmed, there is a strong economic case for retaining a local property tax and council tax itself has a number of significant practical advantages. For example, its yield is predictable and stable and it is relatively easy to collect because properties (unlike people) cannot disappear. It also strongly reinforces the accountability of local authorities to their communities, and helps provide a link between the tax people pay and the benefits they take from local services.

The local authority sets the overall council tax level for their area. However, the tax system does reflect individuals' ability to pay by providing, through council tax benefit, reductions of up to 100 per cent on bills for those on low incomes.

More specifically for pensioners, the Government has done a great deal to improve pension incomes since 1997, spending around £11 billion more on pensioners in 2007-08 than if 1997 policies had continued. The average pensioner household will be around £1,500 per year, or £29 per week, better off in real terms in 2007-08 due to the Government's personal tax and benefit changes than they would have been under the 1997 system.

Local Government (Cornwall)

The Petition of residents of Caradon District, Cornwall,

Declares that we are concerned about the lack of consultation over proposed local government reorganisation in Cornwall.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Minister for Local Government and Community Cohesion to consult with all Cornish residents to ask if they want a single Council for Cornwall under the South West Regional Assembly.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.—[Presented by Ann Winterton, 25 June 2007.] [P000045]

Observation from the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government:

Following an Invitation to Councils in October 2006 to come forward with proposals for a single-tier of local government in their areas, the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government announced on 25 July 2007 that she is minded to allow 9 proposals to proceed towards implementation.

The Secretary of State was minded to allow Cornwall County Council's proposal for a single unitary council for Cornwall to proceed as she judged it to have met all of the five criteria as specified in the original Invitation to Councils.

The Government short-listed 16 of the original 26 unitary proposals in March 2007 and these were subject to a twelve week consultation, which ran until 22 June 2007. Although the Department formally consulted key partners and stakeholders, it was open to anyone to make representations about the proposals and all representations were considered during the assessment process.

In addition, the democratically elected local authorities were able to seek the views of local people on their proposals by any means (including referendums, citizens juries, user panels and opinion polls as they saw fit). The weight attached to a local referendum in the assessment process depended on how far it was judged to accurately reflect informed local opinion. This included whether the question could be easily understood by voters and the steps taken to provide voters with a balanced and full explanation of the complex issues.

Final decisions will be taken on which unitary proposals will be implemented, having regard to all relevant information, if and when the Local Government and Public Involvement in Health Bill is enacted.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Sefton Coastal Woods

The Petition of the Sefton Coast Watch Committee,

Declares the Petitioners' serious concerns over the past ten years with the plans of the organisation presently known as Natural England to clear fell in total 75 hectares, i.e. almost one quarter of the 302 hectares of woodland which make up the Sefton Coastal Woods. These woods are a precious red squirrel refuge and a delight to the 700,000 visitors annually, mainly from Merseyside. They also help to neutralise raised carbon emissions from global warming. This represents 5,000 local residents within the borough of Sefton and supports the unanimous vote of Sefton councillors on 4th March 2004.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urges the Government to initiate a Judicial Review or some other unbiased Parliamentary legal investigation; so that the correct interpretation of the National and European Conservation legislation may be clearly determined. We request that this should happen before Natural England is granted any further licence to clear fell and destroy more of an already existing red squirrel woodland habitat.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.—[Presented by Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas, Official Report, 23 October 2007; Vol. 465, c. 257.] [P000063]

Observation from the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs:

The Government recognises that it is a statutory function of Natural England to manage land as National Nature Reserves (NNRs) under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 and the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949.

Ainsdale Sand Dunes NNR is one of Natural England's flagship reserves, with over 100,000 people a year benefiting from the recreational, landscape and wildlife attractions which the reserve offers. It is wholly in the freehold ownership of Natural England and as such Natural England has a duty to manage the land for nature conservation purposes. The reserve is one of the finest sand dune systems in England, supporting rare and endangered species such as natterjack toads, sand lizards and tiger beetles and over 450 plant species, many of which are locally and regionally rare. Part of the reserve which is formed of extensive planted pinewood also supports an important colony of red squirrels.

The variety of open dune habitats are of national and European importance and the reserve is included within the Sefton Coast Site of Special Scientific Interest (SSSI) and Special Area of Conservation (SAC). However, a large area of the open dune habitats has been lost to development and afforestation. Afforestation has resulted in dune plants and animals unable to survive under the dense shade and needle litter of the pines. The presence of plantations on a retreating coast means that the dune habitats are being squeezed and effectively cut in two. In addition, the pine trees nearest the sea prevent a natural response of the dune fringe to coastline changes. The trees prevent sand from blowing back onto the dunes from the beach so the dunes cannot recover from storm erosion.

To combat this, further dune restoration is required involving some relatively small loss of pine plantation at Ainsdale Sand Dunes NNR, which is being planned in consultation with stakeholders and the local community. Dune restoration is entirely consistent with member states' responsibilities under the Habitats Directive (Directive92/43/EEC) which covers the management of SACs and is implemented in the UK through the Conservation (Natural Habitats, &c.) Regulations 1994 (as amended). Regulation 3(2) requires Natural England to exercise its functions to secure compliance with the requirements of the Habitats Directive. Article 6(2) of the Habitats Directive requires member states to take appropriate steps to avoid the deterioration of natural habitats.

Natural England has a statutory duty under section 28G of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 to exercise its functions, including the management of its NNRs, to further the conservation and enhancement of SSSIs' special conservation interests. The Government is also committed to its Public Service Agreement target to bring 95% of SSSIs by area into favourable condition by 2010. Part of Sefton Coast SSSI is currently in unfavourable condition and the proposed dune restoration will be necessary if this SSSI is to return to favourable condition.

Ainsdale Sand Dunes NNR also forms part of a designated Red Squirrel refuge area, which is a voluntary designation under the UK Biodiversity Action Plan agreed by the Sefton Coast Partnership and is 420 hectares in area. The refuge hosts a population of between 500-800 red squirrels. However, red squirrel populations are not confined to the refuge area but cover an area of 50 square kilometres from Crosby to Southport and neighbouring areas of West Lancashire giving an overall population of between 1000-1500, which is thriving.

To date, Natural England has undertaken dune restoration on the NNR over an area of 30.5 hectares affecting 13.5 hectares of pine plantation. It is currently working with partners on how to restore the dune landscape in an adjacent area of 44.5 hectares which includes a mixture of pine woodland, scrub and dunes. It is anticipated that habitat that could support up to 22 red squirrels will be lost as a result of the proposed felling. Natural England would be required to make an application for a felling licence to the Forestry Commission.

Natural England manages the majority of the NNR pine woodlands (approximately 145 hectares) as part of the Sefton Coast Woodlands 'Forest Plan'. This is a 20 year plan to diversify the woodland age structure, encourage greater public awareness and understanding and to manage the mosaic of habitats within the woodland boundary. This Plan will ensure the continuity of woodland habitat along the coast to the benefit of the red squirrel population. Since the start of the Woodland plan in 2003, Natural England has planted 4444 Scots pine trees and encouraged 2 hectares of natural pine regeneration.
